Mr. BACON. I should like to make the inquiry of the Senator that my colleague [Mr. CLAY] made of the Senator from Idaho. What was the reason which caused the Secretary of the Interior to refuse to approve the last contract?

Mr. McCUMBER. The reason is that the Secretary of the Interior lately approves no contracts. He has started out, I understand, upon a different theory, and upon what ought to have been the right theory in the first instance, that Congress ought to do its duty without the assistance of an attorney, and for the last few years he has declined, I understand, to approve any contracts whatever.

Mr. BACON. I presume the Senator is familiar with the fact that the Secretary of the Interior in refusing to approve the new contract knew the history of this case and knew of the prior contract.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was a different Secretary, of course. I understand that the present Secretary of the Interior will approve no contracts of that kind at the present time; that his theory is that the Indian Office and the Secretary of the Interior ought to take care of the rights of the Indians without their attempting to hire any attorneys.

Mr. BACON. While I am on my feet, if the Senator will pardon me, I should like to ask him another question in the same connection.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will be glad to answer the question as far as I can.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows what is the attitude of the Indians in reference to the justice of this claim, whether they recognize it or not?

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that it is satisfactory to the Indians. I have not heard anything to the contrary. One thing is certain, I think, that the great majority of them have signed the new contract within the last four years. I understand that that is as good evidence as you can get of their being satisfied to continue the same attorneys in the case.

Mr. BACON. Now, with the permission of the Senator, I will ask him one other question, and then I will not trespass further upon him. In a matter of this kind, when we are dealing with the rights of both parties, does not the Senator think we ought to know whether they recognize the propriety of this charge for the fee? Does not the Senator think we ought to inform ourselves on that question before we attempt to act for them and to pay out money to which they would be otherwise entitled?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not only provided for, but in all instances when provision is made for the trial, notice is given, and the Secretary of the Interior looks after the rights of the Indians in those matters. That, it is understood, will be done in all cases. But the fact is that I do not know but all of the adult Indians, at least the majority of them, signed a new contract with the same attorneys to continue them, and they have been working now fourteen years upon this one case.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to state, in answer to the Senator from Georgia, that in addition to the Indians having signed a new contract, five of the leading Indians, when the appropriation bill was up two years ago, came all the way from Washington State with the attorneys from that State with whom they had made the contract to urge the payment of the money and the payment to the attorneys; and the Senate then recommended the payment just before the expiration of the signed contract.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it has been suggested here, and I think unjustly to the conferees, that these attorneys, unable to secure anything before the Senate, then went before the conferees and got a new provision in the bill for their benefit.

Now, let me correct the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] upon that proposition. When this bill passed the Senate it contained a provision that $150,000, 10 per cent, should be immediately paid over to the Indians. What was that for? I suppose we all understand what it was for—at least the committee understood what it was for. At that time it was thought best to let those Indians who had signed the contract for the $150,000 pay the $150,000 themselves. Therefore they would have had it in their power, immediately upon the passage of the act and the payment of the money, to pay over the $150,000 to the attorneys. Of course the attorneys would have had the trouble of collecting it from the Indians after it was paid. Probably they would have got most of it in a very short time. Then the conferees on the part of the House, objecting to that provision, agreed upon another, which seemed more just. What was it? The question arose whether, notwithstanding these contracts, notwithstanding the fact that they had given fourteen years' service, without having before us necessarily everything that would justify us in determining what those attorneys' fees should be, we said, "We will not pass on that, but we will refer it to the Court of Claims to determine whether you are entitled to $1, to $1,000, to $10,000, or to $150,000;" and it is within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to determine that one question.

It is provided here—and the conferees are criticised because of that provision—that the court may take into consideration any contracts heretofore entered into. Why? For the purpose of fixing 10 or 15 per cent? No; for the purpose of determining not only whether it might have been reasonable, but the services that were to be performed under the contract. Whatever that contract says, so far as the price is concerned, it is not binding upon the court. So far as it outlines the duties of the attorneys it is binding to the extent that it determines what the duties were which they were to perform.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. In the absence of any direction in this amendment that the court shall consider these expired contracts or agreement, does the Senator from North Dakota doubt that they would be competent evidence?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can answer that very quickly. If the question arose between the attorneys and the Indians as to what kind of work was to be performed by the attorneys the contracts would be proper evidence.

Mr. BAILEY. Or——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. If the question arose as to the value of the services, then the contracts would not be competent evidence as to the value.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the contracts are competent evidence, both as to the character of the services to be performed and as to the value; of course not conclusive upon either point, but entirely competent upon both points. Therefore I think the express stipulation in this amendment that the court shall consider those contracts is unnecessary if it is only desired that they be used as evidence. As they could be used as evidence without this express provision, I can not escape the conclusion that the purpose of this is to revive them and give them force; in other words, not only to revive and give the expired contracts force, but to operate as an approval of the unapproved contracts.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, it does not seem to me possible that we could give this law that construction. We can not revive those contracts. This action, if the action is maintained at all under the provisions of this law, would be an action on the quantum meruit, and there you would determine simply the legal fact. They could not under this agreement or under this law bring an action upon the old contract which might be evidence for some particular purpose but could not be the basis of the action. If it would be, then, of course, we might have said, without sending it to the court, that the sum shall be $150,000, and nothing else. It would be folly to send it to the Court of Claims upon a quantum meruit, and at the same time say that the court shall give effect to the provision and reinstate a contract that has become void by the lapse of time.

Mr. BAILEY. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that the very purpose of this provision is to make the court do this, instead of Congress. I hardly think Congress would appropriate $150,000 to discharge a contract which, according to its own terms, laid no obligation upon the Indian tribes. But Congress, it seems to me, is now asked to revive the expired contracts, or, what is the same thing, to approve the unapproved contracts, and with them before the court, the court finds these people entitled to a judgment of so much; and then Congress has nothing to do but to appropriate to pay that judgment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have not the amendment here before me, but the amendment proposes to send the matter to the Court of Claims to determine the value of the services. That being the case, the action must be brought upon the quantum meruit, and the court must simply determine what the services were reasonably worth. If the contract is of any benefit to the court in determining what the services are really worth, of course it would be proper that it should be an instrument of evidence; but it can not be used for any other purpose. It can not be used as the basis upon which the action is to be instituted.

I simply desired to clear up this proposition of the title and the character of work that was to be performed, and to say that the committee of conference believe that, so far as the Indians are concerned, they have performed an act of far greater justice in saying that the court shall determine the value of these services, rather than to report it back to Congress. If, in the view of Congress, the court should award too much, it can still be cut down rather than leave it as it was in the act as it stood before, appropriating $150,000, paying it over to the Indians, and then having them pay it to their attorneys as soon as they got it. From the standpoint of those who have opposed the provision, I think they must agree that it is far preferable to the first amendment as it passed the Senate, because if next winter the court determine that $25,000 is a proper sum, Congress may still say that the service was not worth more than $10,000, and refuse to appropriate any more than that sum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senate has spent almost the entire day in debate upon two amendments involving, I think, but little more than $300,000. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to amendment No. 56 in the conference report, which involves property rights amounting to at least $10,000,000. It is the amendment upon which the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] raised the point of order.

It is with some reluctance, sir, that I oppose the conference report, or any portion of it. I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I should not oppose the report if I did not believe that very great injustice would be done to a large number of Indians unless the Senate rejects it and sends it back to conference.

I regret that the rules do not permit of separate action upon each item in the report, and that there is no other way to prevent the perpetration of the wrong which the adoption of this amendment would work to these helpless people except by rejecting the entire report and sending it back to conference. But, sir, the enactment of this amendment into law will destroy the hope and wipe out the only opportunity which 2,000 men, claiming to be members of these tribes, have to prove their right to participate in the patrimony given to them by this Government as a recompense for the great country east of the Mississippi which they once owned. I know that on the disposition of this amendment depends the possession of hundreds of homes, with all of the sacred ties that bind their owners to them. I know that it will result in driving men off the farms they have developed; will take from them all they have accumulated by years of toil and endeavor—years in which they contributed to the development of the rich country included in the Indian Territory, years in which they were fitting themselves to take a place in the citizenship of our country. I can not, I say, for these reasons remain silent and permit this amendment to pass without protest. I consider it a duty I owe the Senate to call attention to the injustice, the great wrong, which would result.

On Saturday afternoon, late in the day's session, I asked the attention of the few Senators then present to this amendment. I contended at that time that, if it were adopted, it would exclude possibly as many as 2,000 Indians from having their cases considered at all by the Commissioner of the Five Civilized Tribes or by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURNHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I dislike to do it for the third time, but this is a very important matter, and I shall insist occasionally, at least, that Senators shall listen to what is going on, and not come in here and ask, "What is my vote?" and then vote with the committee regardless of what has been said or done here. I make the point that there is no quorum present, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ankeny	Clapp	Flint	Kittredge
Bacon	Clay	Frazier	Knox
Bailey	Cullom	Gallinger	La Follette
Blackburn	Daniel	Hansbrough	Lodge
Brandegee	Dillingham	Hemenway	Long
Bulkeley	Dolliver	Hopkins	McCumber
Burnham	Dubois	Kean	McEnery

Mallory	Pettus	Stone	Warner
Money	Piles	Sutherland	Warren
Nelson	Scott	Taliaferro	Wetmore
Overman	Simmons	Teller
Perkins	Spooner	Tillman

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I repeat that when this matter was under discussion on Saturday evening I then asserted that in the neighborhood of 2,000 Indians under existing law are recognized by the Department of the Interior as being fairly entitled to have their right to enrollment investigated and determined, and that if amendment numbered 56 were adopted none of these Indians would have or could have a hearing on their cases. That statement was controverted by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I therefore submitted the matter to the Department of the Interior this morning. I presented to the Secretary the bill, directed his attention to sections 1 and 2 of the act of April 26 last, known as the "Five Civilized Tribes act," and to the proposed amendment numbered 56. The matter was referred by the Secretary to the Assistant Attorney-General for his investigation. I have received a communication from the Secretary of the Interior as a result of that investigation, and I ask the attention of Senators to it. The letter of the Secretary is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 11, 1906.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate.

SIR: I received your letter of this date stating that—

"I invite your attention to an amendment, No. 56, of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill and respectfully request to be informed as to the effect of the proposed amendment No. 56 upon the rights of the Indians whose cases are now pending investigation, and who have been held by your Department to be entitled to investigation by the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes."

Since prior to 1830 there have been white persons residing in certain of the Five Civilized Tribes whose descendants have been recognized as members of the tribes, and have without objection from the tribes improved lands and built homes. Among others may be instanced the descendants of W. J. Thompson, a white intermarried Choctaw, who was transported by the Government to the Indian Territory as a Choctaw under the treaty of 1830; also descendants of the Christian missionary, John Parker Kingsbury and his wife, Mariah, adopted by act of the Choctaw council, November 15, 1854.

Such persons have never had any other home than in such Indian nations, and have not borne allegiance to any other immediate nationality than that of the Indian nation into which they have been affiliated and many of them born.

If the legal effect of such amendment excludes them from enrollment, it is in effect an expatriation from the allegiance to which they were born; and necessarily excludes them from allotment in severalty of the communal lands and gives their homes and improved lands to others who have not toiled to construct or improve, giving the fruit of their labor to other less provident members of the tribe.

The Choctaw treaty of 1830 (7 Stat. L., 333) was executed by "the Mingoes chiefs, captains, and warriors of the Choctaw Nation." Twenty-seven per cent of the representative parties signing the treaty on behalf of the nation bore surnames of the white races, principally English and French. This shows that prior to 1830 there was a large infusion of white blood, and it is shown by the records of this Department that numbers of Indian tribes, recognized as such, are not infrequently without any intermixture of Choctaw blood.

The enrollment acts governing the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes authorizes the Commission to scrutinize the tribal rolls and exclude therefrom persons whose names have been enrolled by fraud or without authority of law.

As construed by the Department, this made every enrolled person presumptively a tribal member, so that formal application for enrollment was unnecessary. The effect of the provision in amendment 56—

This is quoted—

"that the fact that the name of a person appears on the tribal roll of any of said tribes shall not be construed to be an application for enrollment," would be to exclude all such tribal members as have not heretofore filed formal application, whether of white or Indian blood. If formal applications are to be required, a time should be fixed in the future within which the formal application must be filed.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

The last two lines of amendment No. 56 provide:

And the fact that the name of a person appears on the tribal roll of any of said tribes shall not be construed to be an application for enrollment.

Section 1 of the Five Civilized Tribes act provides that—

The Secretary of the Interior may enroll persons whose names appear upon any of the tribal rolls.

But that is not all. Note what follows. There is another condition necessary before the Secretary of the Interior can consider applications of persons for enrollment, the name of the applicant must not only appear on the tribal roll, but there must also be some independent record of previous application to the Commission for enrollment. The balance of the proviso is as follows:

And for whom the records in charge of the Commissioners to the Five Civilized Tribes show application was made prior to December 1, 1905, etc.

Mr. President, the adoption of this amendment will exclude all of that class. It will also exclude those to whom the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] referred when making his point of order against this amendment; besides this, it will exclude a very large class who, under the act of 1896, were given three months in which to present their applications for enrollment to the Dawes Commission. When applications were then made, if any question whatever, whether of fact or of law, was raised as to their right to enrollment, all so challenged were set apart in a doubtful class. Such claims were not determined, but are still pending. They were not entered on any tribal roll, and if this amendment is adopted their rights can not be considered. All told, it will exclude in the neighborhood of 2,000 Indians, who, upon every possible ground, in equity and in law, as the law is construed by the Interior Department, are entitled to have their day in court.

The Senate has listened patiently all afternoon to the discussion of two amendments, one involving $150,000 and the other $186,000. The average amount involved in the case of each of the 2,000 Indians affected by this amendment is in the neighborhood of $5,000. Of these 2,000 claims about 1,000 of them are pending in the Interior Department to-day. The amount involved in these claims in round numbers is upward of $12,000,000.

I have not heard one word in defense of this proposition from the conferees, and I do not know that it can be justified in any way. A good deal has been said about great fees for attorneys. I suppose Senators have heard of the case of one firm of attorneys in the Indian Territory who drove a bargain with two of the tribes and then sought to collect, upon their so-called "contract," a fee amounting to nearly $2,000,000. As I am informed, they finally succeeded in collecting something like $700,000. That firm still has, as I was informed to-day at the Interior Department, a standing contract with those Indians. By its terms they are paid $10,000 a year as a general retainer. But that is not all. Besides this they have a contract to collect for every Indian whose enrollment is denied 10 per cent of the amount such Indian would receive as his share of the tribal property if he were enrolled.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. My attention was diverted for a moment. The Senator may have already given the name, but if not, I hope he will give us the name of the firm of lawyers who are thus sucking the blood out of these Indians.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I have it here—Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish. I am informed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] that this firm collected a fee of $750,000, which is a little more than I thought.

Mr. President, I do not know——

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator if any of these contracts of which he speaks have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not able to answer the question. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand he has approved none.

Mr. SPOONER. The contract under which the firm of lawyers received $750,000 the Secretary of the Interior refused to approve.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir; the Secretary refused to approve their contract and saved the Indians more than a million dollars.

Mr. TILLMAN. How did they get the money?

Mr. SPOONER. Congress approved it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Another case of the lawyers coming here and getting something done.

Mr. SPOONER. Another case of the cornfield lawyer not attending——

Mr. TILLMAN. The cornfield lawyer can not attend to all the stealing in this House. If he could, there would be no stealing.

Mr. SPOONER. He attends to a lot.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not know that this firm of attorneys have been about the Capitol, or that they appeared before the conferees to secure the incorporation of this amendment in the conference report. But though they may not have been within a thousand miles of the Capitol when this provision found its way into the conference report, if it is adopted I predict that they will present a bill to the Indians for a fat attorneys' fee of several hundred thousand dollars for having secured this legislation. And when the Secretary bows their way to the collection of their claim, a bill will be presented to the Senate overruling the Secretary and providing for payment of the fee. Or if such a measure encounters too strong opposition, a bill will be offered to create a commission or special court, upon which gentlemen with liberal views will find a place. Then those thrifty lawyers will realize on this legislation.

Such a course would but repeat the history of their collection of the $750,000 fee. I was informed to-day that a portion of that amount was a charge for securing Congressional legislation, and that at least one of the members of the court or commission, which was created by special act to pass upon their claim, was a brother-in-law of one of the Senators who supported the legislation establishing the court.

Mr. President, the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes was present in all the executive sessions of the Committee on Indian Affairs while the Five Civilized Tribes bill was under consideration. He was ready, in season and out, with objections to any proposition which would require the Commissioner to give consideration to cases for the enrollment of Indians, however meritorious they appeared to be. Many cases were presented to the committee which were admittedly just. But he was always prompt with a protest, and we were constantly warned that even though this case or that class of cases might be worthy, it would not do to open the door or a flood of fraudulent claims would break over the helpless Commission.

Mr. President, I am not prepared to assert that there is any connection between the firm of attorneys who are after these enormous fees and any public official. But upon this very day I have received information which I believe it to be my duty to lay before the Senate in connection with this proposed legislation. In the month of June, 1903, I am informed, the present assistant to the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, and who at that time was chief clerk to the Dawes Commission, was given a leave of absence for a month or so; that during that month he went into the offices of the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish and was employed there briefing their cases for the exclusion of Indians from these rolls. Some of these cases, I am informed, will be affected by this amendment if it is adopted; and, sir, it is asserted that he then came back to the office of the Dawes Commission and proceeded to the consideration of the very cases which he had briefed up and prepared for the Commission, the findings which determined whether these Indians were entitled to be entered upon the rolls. I learned from the Interior Department that that information has reached the Department within the last four or five days, but as yet they have not taken it up for investigation.

Mr. President, this is a matter of tremendous importance to the people whose interests are involved and who will be denied rights of trial if the conference report is adopted, and I appeal to the Senate to reject it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Texas to insist upon his point of order?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator kindly restate it?

Mr. BAILEY. I make the point of order that the provision reported by the conference committee contains matter not in difference between the two Houses, in that it excludes from the benefits of the law the children of intermarried white Indian citizens. It not only changes existing law, which would have been contrary to the rule if it had been proposed in the Senate, but it introduces into the conference report a matter not the subject of difference between the two Houses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion, as he has previously held, that under the usual practice of the Senate a point of order will not lie against a conference report. The matter in the report challenged by the point of order interposed by the Senator from Texas may be considered by the Senate itself when it comes to consider the question of agreeing to the report. The only question under the usual practice of the Senate, in the opinion of the Chair, is, Will the Senate agree to the conference report?

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. President, I understand the rule simply to amount to this, that under the rules of the Senate there is no such practice as a point of order against a conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to accept the ruling of the Chair, because I have always found the Chair to be fair, impartial, and usually correct. I am very much surprised, however, if it is possible for a conference committee to include matter not in difference between the two Houses and it becomes necessary for the Senate to disagree to the entire report in order to reach it.

It might happen, if the Chair will indulge me for a moment, that except against a particular matter, subject to a point of order, I might desire to agree to the report. But as that is the ruling of the Chair, I acquiesce in it, and shall vote against the motion to agree.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in regard to the point of order, the rule is that—

> Conferees may not include in their report matters not committed to them by either House.
> In the Senate, in case such matter is included, the custom is to submit the question of order to the Senate.

I am reading from the rules and compilations we have made.

> In the Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, Vice-President Hobart, in overruling a point of order made on this ground against a conference report during its reading in the Senate, stated that the report having been adopted by one House and being now submitted for discussion and decision in the form of concurrence or disagreement, it is not in the province of the Chair during the progress of its presentation to decide that matter has been inserted which is new or not relevant, but that such questions should go before the Senate when it comes to vote on the adoption or rejection of the report.

In other words, the rule is, and it was so held by Vice-President Hobart, that it should be submitted when the Senate is ready to vote upon the question of rejecting or agreeing to the report.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment and I will yield.

At a later time, when I myself happened to be in the chair, it is stated here:

> The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair) referred with approval to the foregoing decision of Vice-President Hobart, and stated that when a point of order is made on a conference report on the ground that new matter has been inserted the Chair should submit the question to the Senate instead of deciding it himself, as has been the custom in the House.

I had never understood that a point of order against a conference report could not be decided by the Senate. The only point which this seems to me to decide—and I say it with all submission to the Chair—is that a point of order can not be made during the consideration of the report. It has to be submitted when we come to the question of the adoption or rejection of the report. If the Senate sustains the point of order as well taken and holds the matter to be new matter, it operates precisely as it operates in the House. If the Speaker holds it to be new matter, the report is rejected thereby. If the Senate holds it to be new matter, the report is rejected thereby. Therefore the action is a final action and amounts to a rejection of the report. But I have never understood that the point of order may not be decided by the Senate at the appropriate time, just as it may be decided by the Speaker at the appropriate time.

Mr. TELLER. I rose to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question, but he has explained the matter fully and precisely as I understand the law is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. BAILEY. I think, and I thought when I was about to acquiesce, that it would be a dangerous practice to deny the Senate the right to determine first whether or not the conferees had transcended the authority vested in them by their appointment on a conference committee. I remembered that the practice in the House was that the point of order could be made. In that body the Chair passes on it. Of course he passes on it subject to appeal. If his ruling was not challenged, and he held that new matter was incorporated beyond the authority of the conference committee, that ended it. Or if his ruling to that effect was challenged and sustained by the House, that likewise ended it. I think it would not be a safe practice to compel the Senate to reject a report instead of allowing it to first insist upon the point of order.

But, as it is late in the afternoon, and I do not want to delay this matter, and as I know the Senator from Minnesota wants to conclude it, rather than to have that ruling made a precedent I withdraw the point of order until I can still further examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas withdraws his point of order. The question is on agreeing to the report. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair, the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr KITTREDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is absent. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. TALIAFERRO (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I understand the pair has been transferred to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], who is absent, and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming] is unavoidably absent. He stands paired, I believe, with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to inquire if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] transferred his pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]? I understood him to say so.

Mr. CULLOM. That was the arrangement made. If it is not satisfactory, I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. MALLORY. I was paired with the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CULLOM. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MALLORY. I have not the slightest objection to the transfer. I wanted to understand whether the Senator did transfer the pair.

Mr. CULLOM. I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, no. I should like to vote, in order to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. SPOONER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], which will leave the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and myself at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

COLLECTION DISTRICT OF SABINE, TEX.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield that I may submit a report from a committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not in order, under the new rule, to receive the report.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill?

Mr. KEAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10715) to establish an additional collection district in the State of Texas, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. KEAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Texas that this is not a bill I am very heartily in accord with, but I do not want to make any objection. I hope the amendments will be read.

Mr. BAILEY. There are committee amendments, but in the first committee amendment there is a mistake. In line 14, on page 2, the last three words "and to the" ought not to have been stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment will be stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, line 13, after the word "basin," strike out "slip known as slip No. 3 in Taylors Bayou, and to the;" in line 16, after the word "built," strike out "and there shall also be ceded by the State of Texas to the United States exclusive jurisdiction and sovereignty over said waterway, basin, and slips;" in line 22, after the word "thereto," strike out "and upon proof being furnished to him of legal cession by the State of Texas of jurisdiction and sovereignty as aforesaid;" and on page 3, line 21, after the words "United States," strike out "And provided further, That the person or persons, companies, or corporations owning or controlling docks, wharves, or terminals in, along, or upon said canal, or in, along, or upon any basins, slips, or channels connected therewith, directly or indirectly, shall by valid contract agree that the charges for the use of said docks, wharves, and terminals shall be such as the Secretary of War may from time to time approve;" so as to make the section read:

That an additional collection district in the State of Texas shall be, and is hereby, established, to be known as the "district of Sabine," to comprise all of that portion of the State of Texas formerly embraced in the district of Galveston and now hereby detached therefrom, beginning on the Gulf of Mexico at the center of the stream of Sabine Pass; thence north with the center of the stream of Sabine Pass to Sabine Lake; thence with the center of the stream of Sabine Lake to a point directly opposite to the Sabine River; thence north with the east shores of the Sabine River to the north boundary line of Shelby County, Tex.; thence west to the Neches River; thence down said river with its west shores to a north boundary line of Jefferson County; thence in a westerly direction with the said north boundary line to the east boundary line of Liberty County, Tex.; thence south to the Gulf of Mexico; thence in an easterly direction along the Gulf shores to the place of beginning; that Port Arthur, in the county of Jefferson, shall be the port of entry for said district, and Sabine, in the county of Jefferson, shall be a subport of entry: Provided, That there shall be conveyed to the United States, free of cost, a valid title to the line of water communication between Taylors Bayou and Sabine Pass, known as the "Port Arthur Ship Canal," together with a valid title to the existing turning basin and to the artificial slip on which the lumber dock of the Port Arthur Canal and Dock Company is built, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept the said waterways as the property of the United States upon the delivery to him of a clear and indefeasible title thereto; and the said waterways shall thereupon become free public waters of the United States, and be subject to the laws heretofore enacted and that may be hereafter enacted by Congress for the maintenance, preservation, protection, and regulation of navigable waters: Provided further, That the company or corporation conveying title to said canal as aforesaid shall also convey to the United States, free of cost, the fee to a strip of land 150 feet wide along the westerly margin of the canal, except that where the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company prevents the transfer of such strip of land along the westerly margin of said canal there shall be conveyed such strip on the easterly margin thereof as may be necessary to make up such 150 feet of width, with the reservation that until Congress shall have authorized and provided for the enlargement and widening of said canal the said company or corporation, its successors or assigns, shall have the right to control, occupy, and use the said strip of land and every part thereof in the same manner and to the same extent as before the execution and delivery of the conveyance, and also the right to transfer, lease, sell, quitclaim, or otherwise dispose of said property and every part thereof, subject to the grant made to the United States: And provided further, That this act shall take effect only when the foregoing requirements shall have been fully complied with to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 3 in the following words:

SEC. 3. That Sabine, in the State of Texas, shall be, and is hereby, made a subport of entry and delivery in the customs district of Sabine, and a customs officer, or such other officers, shall be stationed at said subport, with authority to enter and clear vessels, receive duties, fees, and other moneys, and perform such other services and receive such compensation as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the exigencies of commerce may require.

And to insert the following as section 3:

SEC. 3. That Sabine, in the State of Texas, shall be, and is hereby, made a subport of entry and delivery in the customs district of Sabine, with the privileges of immediate transportation, as defined by section 7 of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the Statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," being chapter 190, volume 21 of the Statutes at Large; that a deputy collector and such other officers of the customs as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be appointed to reside at said subport; and that, subject to the supervision of the collector at Port Arthur, the deputy collector of said subport is hereby authorized to license and enroll, enter and clear vessels, receive entries, collect duties, fees, and other moneys, and generally to perform the functions prescribed by law for collectors of customs, and perform such other services and receive such compensation as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the exigencies of commerce may require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT.

Mr. KEAN. In order that the new rule may not be enforced, I withdraw the motion I made for an executive session.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4478) to amend section 64 of the bankruptcy act, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend clause 4 of subdivision B of section 64 of the act so as to read as follows:

Fourth. Wages due to workmen, clerks, traveling or city salesmen, or servants which have been earned within three months before the date of commencement of proceedings, not to exceed $300 to each claimant.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WEIGHTS AND SALES OF PRODUCTS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4468) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 1, line 10, before the word "weight," to strike out "greater;" and in the same line, after the word "measure," to insert "less;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read:

"SEC. 10. The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ENTRY OF IRRIGABLE LANDS.

Mr. ANKENY. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18536) providing for the subdivision of lands entered under the reclamation act, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire if the bill leaves it entirely to the Secretary of the Interior to determine the quantity of irrigated land that a man may enter.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to state to the Senator that the bill as it came to this body did leave the matter entirely discretionary. It is discretionary under existing law, but the minimum limit is 40 acres for a farm unit. The bill proposes to allow a reduction to 10 acres.

Mr. SPOONER. Who is to determine that?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SPOONER. Absolutely?

Mr. CARTER. The Committee on Irrigation put an amendment into the bill, which is printed as a part of it, that where owing to market conditions, climate, and soil the land is specially adapted to the growth of fruit or garden produce the Secretary of the Interior may reduce the limit to 20 acres, not to 10, as proposed by the House. That was for the purpose for allowing the bill to be justly applicable to regions in Arizona and to certain fruit regions in California, where a 20-acre tract would probably be quite sufficient.

Mr. PETTUS. Is there any matter before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which has been read. Is there objection to its consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 3, after the word "Interior," to insert "by reason of market conditions and the special fitness of the soil and climate for the growth of fruit and garden produce;" in line 6, after the words "may be," to strike out "reasonably required" and insert "sufficient;" in line 11, after the word "than," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" and at the end of the section to insert the following proviso, "Provided, That an entryman may elect to enter under said reclamation act a lesser area than the minimum limit in any State or Territory;" so as to make the section read:

That whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, by reason of market conditions and the special fitness of the soil and climate for the growth of fruit and garden produce, a lesser area than 40 acres may be sufficient for the support of a family on lands to be irrigated under the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, he may fix a lesser area than 40 acres as the minimum entry and may establish farm units of not less than 20 nor more than 160 acres. That wherever it may be necessary, for the purpose of accurate description, to further subdivide lands to be irrigated under the provisions of said reclamation act, the Secretary of the Interior may cause subdivision surveys to be made by the officers of the Reclamation Service, which subdivisions shall be rectangular in form, except in cases where irregular subdivisions may be necessary in order to provide for practicable and economical irrigation. Such subdivision surveys shall be noted upon the tract books in the General Land Office, and they shall be paid for from the reclamation fund: Provided, That an entryman may elect to enter under said reclamation act a lesser area than the minimum limit in any State or Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 15, before the word "lands," to insert "by relinquishment;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That wherever the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of the reclamation act, shall acquire by relinquishment lands covered by a bona fide unperfected entry under the land laws of the United States, the entryman upon such tract may make another and additional entry, as though the entry thus relinquished had not been made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 10, to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 4. That in the town sites of Heyburn and Rupert, in Idaho, created and surveyed by the Government, on which town sites settlers have been allowed to establish themselves, and had actually established themselves prior to March 5, 1906, in permanent buildings not easily moved, the said settlers shall be given the right to purchase the lots so built upon at an appraised valuation for cash, such appraisement to be made under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. Reclamation funds may be used to defray the necessary expenses of appraisement and sale, and the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the reclamation fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 22, to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 5. That where any bona fide desert-land entry has been or may be embraced within the exterior limits of any land withdrawal or irrigation project under the act entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," approved June 17, 1902, and the desert-land entryman has been or may be directly or indirectly hindered, delayed, or prevented from making improvements or from reclaiming the land embraced in any such entry by reason of such land withdrawal or irrigation project, the time during which the desert-land entryman has been or may be so hindered, delayed, or prevented from complying with the desert-land law shall not be computed in determining the time within which such entryman has been or may be required to make improvements or reclaim the land embraced within any such desert-land entry: Provided, That if after investigation the irrigation project has been or may be abandoned by the Government, time for compliance with the desert-land law by any such entryman shall begin to run from the date of notice of such abandonment of the project and the restoration to the public domain of the lands withdrawn in connection therewith, and credit shall be allowed for all expenditures and improvements heretofore made on any such desert-land entry of which proof has been filed; but if the reclamation project is carried to completion so as to make available a water supply for the land embraced in any such desert-land entry, the entryman shall thereupon comply with all the provisions of the aforesaid act of June 17, 1902, and shall relinquish all land embraced within his desert-land entry in excess of 160 acres, and as to such 160 acres retained he shall be entitled to make final proof and obtain patent upon compliance with the terms of payment prescribed in said act of June 17, 1902, and not otherwise. But nothing herein contained shall be held to require a desert-land entryman who owns a water right and reclaims the land embraced in his entry to accept the conditions of said reclamation act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report accompanying it.

Mr. KEAN. It seems to be a pretty important bill, but I am informed by the Senator from Montana that it is a very carefully drawn one. Therefore I shall not object to its passage, but I think the report ought to be published with it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be published in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

[Senate report No. 3897, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Irrigation, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18536) providing for the subdivision of lands entered under the reclamation act, and for other purposes, report the same back with amendments, as follows:

In section 1, page 1, after the words "Secretary of the Interior," on line 3, add the words "by reason of market conditions and the special fitness of the soil and climate for the growth of fruit and garden produce."

In section 1, page 2, on line 4, strike out the words "reasonably required" and insert in lieu thereof the word "sufficient."

In section 1, page 1, on line 9, strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

At the end of section 1, page 2, add the words "Provided, That an entryman may elect to enter under said reclamation act a lesser area than the minimum limit in any State or Territory."

In section 2, page 2, on line 9, after the word "acquire," insert the words "by relinquishment."

Add a new section, to be known as section 4, in words as follows:

"That in the town sites of Heyburn and Rupert, in Idaho, created and surveyed by the Government, on which town sites settlers have been allowed to establish themselves, and had actually established themselves prior to March 5, 1906, in permanent buildings not easily moved, the said settlers shall be given the right to purchase the lots so built upon at an appraised valuation, for cash, such appraisement to be made under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. Reclamation funds may be used to defray the necessary expenses of appraisement and sale, and the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the reclamation fund."

The purpose of this amendment is to provide the manner of sale of lots in the town sites of Heyburn and Rupert, both being towns on the Minidoka reclamation project, in Idaho, for cash, at an appraised value, to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, at the expense of the reclamation fund, the money derived from the sale of the lots so occupied by permanent improvements to be covered back into said reclamation fund. Almost a year ago it was announced that these lots would be offered for sale some time during the autumn. Later the land department ordered a survey and appraisement of these respective town sites, and the announcement was made that the sale of said lots would take place soon after the acceptance of said survey and appraisement.

Later a date certain was fixed, viz, November 20, 1905, and official notice of such sale was published in a number of newspapers. Following this came an abandonment of the plan to sell said lots until some indefinite date. A large number of the permanent improvements made on these two town sites were commenced, if not finished, prior to the postponement of this sale. They were made in entire good faith and with the assurance that they would be permitted to purchase these lots within a few weeks. The builders of these improvements took their chances on an auction sale and were entirely willing at that time to purchase the lots at auction.

Since the postponement of the sale of these lots the business built up by the business men of these respective towns, Heyburn and Rupert, have made each important trading centers, thereby increasing materially the value of these lots so occupied by these early settlers. These occupants, business men, are entirely willing to pay a fair valuation for the lots they occupy, such as may be fixed by disinterested appraisers.

By the settlement of these business houses on these town sites set aside by the Reclamation Service the hardships of the early settlers on their homesteads nearby have been minimized and the development of the tract materially benefited.

Section 5 is added as an amendment to the bill for the purpose of relieving desert-land entrymen, who are not at fault, from the effects of an act of the Government which may hinder, delay, or prevent them from compliance with the desert-land law. At the same time, the section provides that an entryman thus hindered, delayed, or prevented from complying with the law, if furnished with an available water supply by the Government, shall relinquish all land covered by his entry in excess of 160 acres, and comply with the terms and conditions of the reclamation act.

This legislation appears necessary, just, and desirable, because in certain sections, particularly in the State of Washington and in the northern part of Montana, desert-land entrymen, in good faith endeavoring to comply with the law, without notice were suddenly embraced within a Government irrigation project under the reclamation act, and thus prevented from complying with the desert-land law by reason of the fact that the Government project contemplated the appropriation and use of all the water from the stream from which the desert-land entrymen expected to obtain a supply of water for the use of the lands embraced in their respective entries.

In the nature of things one or more years must in each case elapse after the withdrawal of land for the irrigation project before the Government is able to determine the feasibility thereof; then a considerable time must necessarily elapse before the irrigation works can be constructed. Through such delay and interference the time in which the desert-land entryman is required to make improvements, reclaim the land, and make final proof expires. Section 5 is intended to relieve the entrymen from injury through such interference and delay on the part of the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

IMPORTATION OF IMPURE TEA.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. STONE. For what purpose?

Mr. PETTUS. I wish to move an adjournment.

Mr. STONE. I hope the Senator will not make that motion yet.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. KEAN. I wish the Senator would withhold that motion for a moment, that we may have an executive session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Missouri has the floor and declines to yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1548.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897.

Mr. KEAN. That bill can not pass at the present time, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. STONE. Did I understand the Senator from New Jersey to object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from New Jersey stated that the bill could not pass at the present time.

Mr. STONE. Do I understand that objection is made?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the remark of the Senator from New Jersey to be equivalent to an objection.

Mr. KEAN. It is.

Mr. STONE. I suppose the Senator has that privilege.

ENTRY OF COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of House bill 17415. It is a little bill, giving coal miners in Alaska the same right to make entry of coal lands under the coal-land laws that are applicable elsewhere. I understand the bill has been heretofore read, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. It has been.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 17415) to authorize the assignees of coal-land locations to make entry under the coal-land laws applicable to Alaska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been heretofore read. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that is a bill changing very materially the land laws of this country, and I do not think it ought to be passed in this way. I will object to it.

Mr. PILES. I hope the Senator will not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PILES. I do not understand that the bill was objected to.

Mr. TELLER. I objected to the bill. As I have stated, I think a bill that changes materially the land laws of this country should not pass with less than a quorum in the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

JOHN P. HUNTER.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 3020) for the relief of John P. Hunter.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John P. Hunter, late United States marshal for the district of South Carolina, $308.13, which sum shall be taken and accepted and receipted for in full satisfaction of his claim for services performed by his deputy, H. J. Hickson, in the case of the United states against J. T. Tillman.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5986) for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Florida.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 11, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 9, were read and approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the following joint resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (No. 172) to supply a deficiency in an appropriation for the postal service.

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $80,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers for the fiscal year 1906.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18024) for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, for the present I am not prepared to assent——

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman can demand a separate vote on each amendment if he chooses, or by unanimous consent it can be postponed, or it can be postponed by motion.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask unanimous consent that it be postponed for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent temporarily that the consideration of the bill before the House may be postponed.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, this is simply, I understand, a motion to nonconcur and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Yes; to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURTON of Ohio, Mr. BISHOP, and Mr. LESTER.

ALLOTTING LANDS IN LIMITS OF BLACKFEET INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 19068) to survey and allot lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and to open the surplus lands to settlement, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, is this the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it is the bill opening the Blackfeet Indian Reservation.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. ZENOR.

CLOSING CERTAIN PLACES OF BUSINESS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ON SUNDAY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call up the bill (H. R. 16483) requiring certain places of business in the District of Columbia to close on Sunday.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person in the District of Columbia to sell or to offer for sale, or to keep open any place of business for the sale or delivery of, any groceries or meats or vegetables or other provisions on Sunday, except that from the 1st day of June until the 1st day of October meats sold prior to Sunday may be delivered at any time before 10 o'clock of the morning of that day. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this act shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $50 for the first offense, and for each subsequent offense by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $100, or by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia for a period of not less than one month nor more than three months, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That all prosecutions for violations of this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia and in the name of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who reported this bill.

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. BABCOCK. As much time as is necessary.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this legislation is to extend the rest day to the employees and the shopkeepers within the District of Columbia who hitherto by a common custom have kept their places of business open on Sunday. Their clerks and they themselves have not been able to have a day with their families or to attend church, as have the employees and the proprietors of other business houses and places within the District. The purpose of this bill is to make a uniform regulation by law for the closing of such places on Sunday, and all those who are to be affected by the bill favor its enactment into law. The employers favor the bill; the employees favor it. Many associations in the District favor the enactment of this bill into law. We have provided in the bill that during the heated months of the year purchases of meat made on Saturday may be delivered up until 10 o'clock on Sunday morning. This is for the purpose of enabling those who do not keep refrigerators or have ice boxes to have their meat delivered to them on Sunday morning. We have restricted the bill to the character of employment that I have indicated here, so that we could avoid the opposition that generally arises against legislation prohibiting work upon the Sabbath day.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Have not we a Puritan Sunday now?

I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], Mr. Speaker, whether we have not a Puritan Sunday now in the District of Columbia, and whether it is not a fact that the newspapers published in this city have expressed the opinion time and time again that the present Sunday law is entirely satisfactory to all elements of the population, including the church element?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] raises a question that I can not go into, for the reason that it is so general. I will say this, that the Sunday-closing laws within the District have not resulted in the closing of these small market places—grocery stores and meat markets. And it is for the purpose of closing these that this legislation has been asked by those who are to be affected by it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOUTELL). Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is the committee in receipt of any particular complaint to the effect that the opening of these small shops on certain hours of a Sunday has given offense to the people of the District?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; not at all. But we have received pathetic requests from both employers and employees, who work every day in the week, including Sunday, in these places, and have no day and no part of a day with their families, that this bill be passed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does this affect the small fruit stands?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; it does not affect the fruit stands.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does it affect the small restaurants that also handle a small amount of vegetables?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all. It affects shopkeepers, and only shopkeepers who run small markets.

Mr. STAFFORD rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman consider that when a person goes into a restaurant and buys a sandwich, that that is a sale?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is it, if it is not a sale?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The bill closes shops that are now opened for the sale of merchandise.

Mr. STAFFORD. A close reading of the bill shows that you prohibit the sale, or offering for sale, of any groceries, meats, or vegetables or other provisions. A strict construction of that language will cover the sale of sandwiches or any provisions in a restaurant. It says nothing whatsoever as to the sale in grocery stores, meat shops, and the like, and it is broad enough to cover the sale in restaurants.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If it is a proper construction in the view of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], it is probable that some others entertaining a similar view of the bill would take the question into court and have it settled that way, but it is not the purpose of the legislation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I agree with the gentleman that it is not the purpose to include sales by restaurants, but the gentleman does not claim that if the bill is ambiguous we should force upon persons who are restaurant keepers and the like the necessity of going to the courts to have the law construed. I believe our duty is to make the bill clear and plain and remove all ambiguity that I claim now exists.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I agree with the gentleman that what I have stated is the purpose of the bill, and I contend that the bill clearly states its purpose.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is there any objection to putting a proviso in here excepting from the operation of this law the fruit stands and the restaurant keepers?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. That would modify it; also, the hotels.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It never was intended that hotels and restaurants should be affected by this bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman contend that the bill, instead of saying "groceries and meats," could state that a restaurant could sell alcoholic beverages under the law?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that all places that now keep beverages of any character whatever in their shops are closed on Sundays.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but I beg the gentleman's pardon. What I am trying to get at is the meaning of the bill. The bill prohibits any business in the sale of meats on Sunday. You say that does not apply to restaurants and hotels?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It does not apply to them.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the bill, instead of using the words "sale of meat," uses precisely the language and substitutes "alcoholic beverages" for meat. That would allow any restaurant to sell alcoholic beverages on a Sunday.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a question I will leave as decided by the gentleman from Illinois, who is always able to pass upon such questions.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be willing to leave it to the gentleman from Illinois, but I would like to have the gentleman's opinion, because he is instructing the Members of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not instructing the House, but am explaining what this bill provides.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman know that he is informing the House, and always informs the House when he addresses the House?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Ah; I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this is the bill about which Members of Congress have been receiving so many communications with reference to the Sunday-closing bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is not the bill. We purposely restricted this bill, so as to meet the objections and protests that were received here by Members of Congress against the bill to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I understand the gentleman, in the beginning he stated that this was for the relief of the employees.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And the employers also.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then why do you make the exception until 10 o'clock on Sunday morning?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is for the purpose of enabling people who do not have ice boxes and ice chests to have their meat delivered to them on Sunday morning when they have purchased it the day before.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does not that defeat relief of the employees?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a matter we had to compromise on by allowing deliveries up to 10 o'clock on Sunday morning.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think it defeats your purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The bill as it stands is satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. You say that this will not apply to the fruit stands?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is not the intention to have it apply to them.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It may not be the intention, but I ask if the provisions of this bill would not be construed to practically eliminate the sale of fruits on the streets on a Sunday?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman wants my opinion, my opinion is it will not be so construed as to apply to fruit stands.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Would not bananas, oranges, lemons, and other fruit be construed as provisions?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not within the scope of this bill.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The law would not construe them as provisions? I am not a lawyer, and I am simply asking for information. If they are provisions, this bill will close every one of those stores. They are certainly provisions, and that would make it apply to all the little fruit stands.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not think they would be construed as provisions; and they are not included within the scope of the bill.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It may not be the intent of the gentleman to include them, but they are included.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, to meet the objections and to get on with this bill, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 9, after the word "day," the words "Provided, That nothing in this bill shall prevent the sale of fruit at fruit stands and the regular business of restaurants and hotels."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there any other amendment?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think there are no other amendments.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to ask the gentleman a question about this bill as it has now been amended and reported. Does it apply to stores that sell tobacco, cigars, and things of that kind?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It does not refer to cigar stores.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why should it not? For instance, I saw a cigar store open for the first time on Pennsylvania avenue, New York avenue, and Fifteenth street, yesterday, run by a trust combination, open on that day, Sunday.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Cigars or tobacco are neither provisions nor groceries.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, then, this bill permits it to be done; permits cigar stores to be run all day?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why should it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We are legislating for the people who were asking the legislation, and cigar-store keepers or their employees did not ask for legislation of this character, and, I may add, no one else made such request.

Mr. BARTLETT. They are now generally closed on a Sunday. Most of the cigar stores and cigar stands in the hotels are closed, as a rule, on Sunday; but yesterday I saw for the first time a new cigar store was open on the corner of Fifteenth street, New York avenue, and Pennsylvania avenue, run by what is commonly known as the "cigar trust."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yielded to the gentleman for a question, and I can not yield further.

The SPEAKER. The amendment that the gentleman sent to the desk refers to a bill rather than the act. If there be no objection, it will be corrected in that respect, so as to read "nothing in this act."

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. As I understand the gentleman from Kansas, these people are practically a unit in asking for relief, the employers and the employees?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If that is the case, can not they agree among themselves without coming to Congress?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They have never been able to do so.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Has the gentleman given any attention to the question of the constitutionality of this bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no doubt about the constitutionality of the act.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The Constitution says that no State shall pass a law recognizing any religion. This is certainly a recognition of a religion——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all. We think it is properly a police regulation. Now, I can not yield to the gentleman further. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama eight minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a clipping from a newspaper and two letters, which I desire to have read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

FAVORS SUNDAY CLOSING—T. E. SEWELL PETITIONS COMMISSIONERS FOR LEGISLATION ON SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

The Commissioners were asked yesterday by T. E. Sewell, of 2225 Thirteenth street NW., to recommend legislation which will terminate the present rapidly increasing working and business transactions in this city on Sunday.

Mr. Sewell declares that the Sunday working evil has been growing more and more each year, until at the present time Sunday closely resembles any other week day.

WOMAN'S INTERDENOMINATIONAL MISSIONARY UNION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1906.

Congressman HEFLIN.

DEAR SIR: The women of the Interdenominational Union of the District heartily indorse your amendment to the Wadsworth bill and desire that said amendment be adopted and the bill passed.

Yours, for righteousness,

BELLE CALDWELL CULBERTSON, President.

THE INTERNATIONAL REFORM BUREAU (INCORPORATED),
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1906.

Hon. J. T. HEFLIN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Heflin bill should certainly be added as an amendment to the Wadsworth Sunday bill for the District, for your bill touches the greater evil of the two. The Wadsworth bill aims to stop Sunday traffic, which is much to be desired, and it has been rightfully demanded with persistency by the clerks who have lost their Sunday rest. The situation illustrates Horace Greeley's great saying that "the liberty of rest for each demands a law of rest for all." But Sunday labor is a greater hardship; it is fitly called "Sunday slavery" by some of its victims. Indeed, the slave of former times had one day in the week for rest, and sang as he gathered with his fellows, "Every day'll be Sunday by and by." But there are many in this District who work seven days in the week, because this common mark of civilization—the prohibition of Sunday toil—is here lacking, through a clerical error made years ago when the Sunday law enacted by the people of the District themselves fell through because it was discovered that the mayor had failed to sign it. The general secretary of the Reform Bureau, Mr. B. B. Bassette, shortly before the opening of Congress, counted twenty dirt carts coming out of the Senate building, in course of construction, on Sunday. I myself have on a recent Sunday counted seventeen men at work there, mostly of the very class who most need the day both for rest and moral culture. The main reason why your bill forbidding Sunday labor has not been pressed as hard upon the attention of the Commissioners and committees as the Wadsworth bill relating to traffic is that the laborers are too ignorant and unorganized to act for themselves; but Congress should be the more zealous to protect them because of their helplessness. It is time that the District should be brought into civilization in this matter.

Wishing you success in your effort, I am,

Fraternally, yours,

WILBUR F. CRAFTS, Superintendent.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I could not gain the consent of the committee to offer my amendment at this time. I think it is, indeed, important that this bill should be amended as suggested in one of the letters I have had read. My bill touches the greater evil of the two. As suggested in the newspaper article, it is hard to distinguish Sunday from any other day in this District.

Mr. Speaker, in this Republic the voice of a majority of the people is supreme—the majority rules. That a vast majority of the people in America sanction the observance of the Christian Sunday is borne out in the fact that every State in the Union except two—California and Idaho, I believe—have a Sunday law. Can it be that all these States, enjoying the blessings of a Sunday law, will, through their Representatives in Congress, deny them to the people of the District of Columbia? There are people in the District who look upon any day of rest as a useless obstacle in the way of their greed. They, of course, oppose this bill, and agree that any man or woman who advocates it is a crank. This is a Christian nation, declared so to be by the Supreme Court of the United States. And the Christian Sunday has been sanctioned by the usages and customs of a vast majority of the American people. It is well that one day out of every seven should be designated as a day of rest. To allow every sect or society to disregard the Sunday of the American people and carry on their labors as they do in the "six days" named in Holy Writ and now recognized throughout the nation as the days in which to labor would be a serious blunder and a foolish thing to do. Our fathers and mothers have set apart the Christian Sunday as a day of rest. When the foreigner comes to America he comes knowing that this is a Christian nation, and that there is a Sunday recognized by law; but instead of observing the time-honored and law-sanctioned customs of our people we are informed that there are those among us who think that they should be excused from the observance of our day of rest—the Christian Sunday. We do not propose to compel them to worship on that day, but we do object to having the Sunday of the American people ignored and made a day for common labor. Let us show to the world that in the capital of this God-fearing nation the Lord's day shall be observed.

I desire to include in my remarks a portion of an opinion rendered by Mr. Justice Scott, of the supreme court of Missouri, in the case of the State v. Ambs, passing on the constitutionality of the Sunday law:

Those who question the constitutionality of our Sunday laws seem to imagine that the Constitution is to be regarded as an instrument formed for a State composed of strangers collected from all quarters of the globe, each with a religion of his own, bound by no previous social ties, nor sympathizing in any common reminiscenses of the past; that, unlike ordinary laws, it is not to be construed in reference to the State and condition for those for whom it was intended, but that the words in which it is comprehended are alone to be regarded, without respect to the history of the people for whom it was made.

It is apprehended that such is not the mode by which our organic law is to be interpreted. We must regard the people for whom it was ordained. It appears to have been made by Christian men. The Constitution on its face shows that the Christian religion was the religion of its framers. At the conclusion of that instrument it is solemnly affirmed by its authors, under their hands, that it was done in the year of our Lord 1820—a form adopted by all Christian nations, in solemn public acts, to manifest the religion to which they adhere.

Long before the convention which framed our constitution was assembled, experience had shown that the mild voice of Christianity was unable to secure the observance of Sunday as a day of rest. The convention sat under a law exacting a cessation from labor on Sunday. (Edwards's Compilation, vol. 1, 302.) The journal of the convention will show that this law was obeyed by its members as such by adjournments from Saturday until Monday. In the tenth section of the fourth article of the constitution it is provided that if the governor does not return a bill within ten days (Sundays excepted) it shall become a law without his signature. Although it may be said that this provision leaves it optional with the governor whether he will consider bills or not on Sunday, yet, regard being had to the circumstances under which it was inserted, can any impartial mind deny but that it contains a recognition of the Lord's day as a day exempt by all law from all worldly pursuits? The framers of the constitution, then, recognized Sunday as a day to be observed, acting themselves under a law which exacted a compulsive observance of it. If a compulsive observance of the Lord's day as a day of rest had been deemed inconsistent with the principles contained in the constitution, can anything be clearer than, as the matter was so plainly and palpably before the convention, a specific condemnation of the Sunday law would have been ingrafted upon it? So far from it, Sunday was recognized as a day of rest, when, at the same time, a cessation from labor on that day was coerced by a penalty. They, then, who ingrafted on our constitution the principles of religious freedom therein contained, did not regard the compulsory observance of Sunday necessary to secure a full enjoyment of the rights of conscience. How could those who conscientiously believe that Sunday is a hallowed time, to be devoted to the worship of God, enjoy themselves in its observance amidst all the turmoil and bustle of worldly pursuits, amidst scenes by which the day is desecrated, which they conscientiously believed to be holy? The Sunday law was not intended to compel people to go to church, or to perform any religious act as an expression of preference for any particular creed or sect, but was designed to coerce a cessation from labor; that those who conscientiously believed that the day was set apart for worship of God might not be disturbed in their performance of their religious duties. Every man is free to use the day for the purpose for which it is set apart or not, as he pleases. If he sees proper to devote it to religious purposes, the law protects him from the disturbance of others. If he will not employ himself in religious duties, he is restrained from interrupting those who do. Thus the law, so far from affecting religious freedom, is a means by which the rights of conscience are enjoyed. It can not be maintained that the law exacting a cessation from labor on Sunday compels an act of religious worship. Because divines may teach their church that the reverential observance of the Lord's day is an act of religious worship, it by no means follows that the prohibition of worldly labor on that day was designed by the general assembly as an act of religion. Such an idea can only be based upon a supposition of an entire ignorance in the legislature of the nature of worship which God exacts from his creatures. A compliance with the law, induced by a fear of its penalties, could never be regarded as an act acceptable to the Deity. No act of worship, unless dictated by heartfelt love, can be pleasing to the Almighty. God listens alone to the voice of the heart.

Bearing in mind that our Constitution was framed for a people whose religion was Christianity, who had long lived under and experienced the necessity of laws to secure the observance of Sunday as a day of rest, how remarkable would it have been that they should have agreed to make common, by their fundamental law, a day consecrated from the very birth of their religion, and hallowed by associations dear to every Christian. Convert Sunday into a worldly day by law, and what becomes of Christianity? How can we reconcile the idea to our understanding, that a people professing Christianity would make a fundamental law by which they would convert Sunday into a worldly day? It would have been an act of deadly hostility to the religion they professed, exposing it to the danger of being reduced to the condition in which it was before the Roman world was governed by Christian princes. Though it might not be persecuted by the arm of the civil power, it would be driven by the annoyances and interruptions of the world to corners and by-places, in which to find a retreat for its undisturbed exercise.

How startling would be the announcement to the people of Missouri that, by their organic law, they had abolished Sunday as a day of rest, and had put it out of the power of their legislators ever to restore it as such? With what sorrow would the toil-worn laborer receive the intelligence that there was no longer by law a day of rest from his labor? The poor beasts of burden would soon find by experience that our laws were no longer tempered by the softening influence of Christianity, and all the social advantages by which great and good men have attributed to the observances of Sunday as a day of rest would be taken away.

In conclusion, we are of opinion that there is nothing inconsistent with the Constitution, as it was understood at the time of its adoption, with a law compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest. The Constitution itself recognizes that day as a day of rest, and from the circumstances under which it was done, we are warranted in the opinion that a power to compel a cessation from labor on that day was not designated to be withheld from the legislature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the Clerk read the bill as it would read with my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have the Clerk read the bill as it would read if amended, in his time.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to prevent certain labor in the District of Columbia on Sunday, and to require certain places of business to close on that day.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person in the District of Columbia to labor erecting buildings or constructing railroads on Sunday in said District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of section 1 of this act shall, on conviction therefor, be fined not less than $25 and not more than $50.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person in the District of Columbia to sell or to offer for sale, or to keep open any place of business for the sale or delivery of, any groceries or meats or vegetables or other provisions on Sunday, except that from the 1st day of June until the 31st day of October meats sold prior to Sunday may be delivered at any time before 10 o'clock of the morning of that day. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this act shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $50 for the first offense, and for each subsequent offense by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $100, or by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia for a period of not less than one month nor more than three months, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That all prosecutions for violations of this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia and in the name of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have been assured of the support of the Democratic side of this House for this Sunday law for the District of Columbia, and I have had assurances from several Republicans that they would support it. Adopt my amendment and you will do good service to this District and the nation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was read the third time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill, with instructions.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the committee and that that motion lie on the table, and upon that I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman would have been recognized; in fact, the Chair indicated to the gentleman that he would be recognized to move to recommit. Under the rule the friends of a bill are preferred unless there is some good reason to the contrary, in the judgment of the Chair. Upon the whole and under all the circumstances, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama to move to recommit. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill, with the instructions to incorporate the amendment which has just been reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to recommit the bill, with instructions to report the same back with the substitute which he had read a few moments ago.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HEFLIN) there were—ayes 43, noes 150.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. All those in favor of the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-three gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. As many as are opposed to taking the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced—ayes 35, noes 151, not a sufficient number demanding the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, there were 35 ayes—not a sufficient number.

Accordingly the yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The bill was passed.

EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 19642) to regulate the keeping of employment agencies in the District of Columbia where fees are charged for procuring employment of situations.

The bill was read.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment for the purpose of correcting a clerical error.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, in line 24, strike out "his" and insert "their."
On page 12, in line 4, strike out "or" and insert "and in default of payment thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the word "expected," in line 14, page 5.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I move to amend by striking out "expected" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "excepted."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I notice here, in section 8, that a scale of prices or fees is fixed, to be paid by employers seeking help and by applicants for employment. I should like to ask the gentlemen do these employment bureaus operate throughout the country in all the principal cities?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. They do.

Mr. RUCKER. In practically every city in the country you find employment bureaus?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Employment agencies, so called.

Mr. RUCKER. Seeking to find employment for laboring people of all classes—for pay?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. For pay.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman if the slogan of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] still applies, of all sorts of work for all sorts of people, and if this is the way they get it, by paying for it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The slogan still applies.

Mr. RUCKER. By paying experts to find employment for them?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; in domestic work. That is always the case.

Mr. RUCKER. This is for all kinds of work, provided for all kinds of people, and they pay experts to find it for them?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; and if a person has money enough to pay an expert, and to save himself the trouble of looking around when he wishes to change his employment, he has a right to do it.

Mr. RUCKER. The idea is that the laboring man is too busy, and so he pays somebody else to find work for him.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. And as a rule employment agencies are not very prosperous for that reason.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was acordingly read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON AND WESTERN MARYLAND RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12086) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company."

The bill was read.

During the reading of the bill the following occurred:

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUCKER. I rise simply, Mr. Speaker, to call attention to the fact, although I will not make the point at this minute, that I am quite sure if the point of no quorum were raised——

The SPEAKER. The presence of a quorum was ascertained a few minutes ago.

Mr. RUCKER. Since then several bills have passed. I only want to say, Mr. Speaker, if I may have a minute, that I will not make the point at this time, because I notice that one of the most distinguished Members of the House—the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]—is absent, and if the point were made——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has just left the Hall of the House for the purpose of getting his lunch.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not enter upon debate during the reading of the bill. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill, with the following committee amendments:

Page 5, line 22, strike out the period after the word "granted" and insert a colon, and add the following:

"Provided further, That the location, plans, and elevation of said railroad for crossing the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal shall be approved by the trustees of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal before the commencement of any work on the property of the said canal company."

Page 11, line 19, strike out the words "three years" and insert the words "eighteen months."

Page 11, line 20, insert before the word "and" the following: "the work to commence within sixty days."

Mr. SULZER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRELL. I yield for a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields for a question.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, all I want to say is that this is a very important railroad bill, and I want to ask the gentleman who has the matter in charge to give us some explanation as to why this lapsed railroad charter, this old railroad charter, which lapsed away back in 1892, should now be revived and extended for eighteen months?

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] I will say that this is the same bill that passed the House last year and went over to the Senate, but owing to the lateness of the time it was impossible for it to pass there. The bill is identical with the one that was passed last year, with the exception of the proviso which the Clerk has just read in the shape of an amendment, limiting it to eighteen months instead of as the original bill provided for three years, and also providing that work must be begun by the railroad company within sixty days. Therefore it absolutely makes it necessary for the railroad company to begin work at once and complete this road within eighteen months. It will be impossible for them to do it in less time than that, as a certain amount of construction is of a very difficult character. It does not grant any privilege in any way, shape, or manner to the railroads except to allow them to construct the road on the main-line side of the canal rather than along the towpath.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to have just a few minutes.

Mr. MORRELL. How much time does the gentleman desire—ten minutes?

Mr. SULZER. No; two or three minutes.

Mr. MORRELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I only want to say a few words. The explanation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] regarding this bill is not very satisfactory. The fact that a similar bill was rushed through the last Congress in its closing days is no reason why we should rush this bill through this Congress. In 1889 Congress passed an act giving this railway company the right to construct this road and they were to do it within three years. The railroad company never did a single thing. The three years expired March 2, 1892, and the charter lapsed, became absolutely null and void, and this bill revives it, and that after practically fourteen years have gone by. It seems to be very easy for a railroad company to get a bill through Congress extending some old forfeited charter, but I undertake to say that if a poor man wanted to pass a bill to get him his rights, he would have very serious difficulty in doing it. Railroad corporations always seem to have the right of way in matters when they want something. This bill now gives the railroad company eighteen months to do what it should have done fourteen years ago. There is not a single provision in the bill to protect the people of the District of Columbia. I am opposed on general principles to reviving these forfeited franchises without some compensation to the people for the privilege. I believe we should carefully scrutinize every bill granting franchises to corporations.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I would say, in answer to the gentleman from New York, that there is a universal demand from every citizen living in Georgetown to-day for this road to be built. They are absolutely clamoring for it. The business people of Georgetown were even anxious to have a barge service established to transport freight to and from Shepherds Point, so as to connect with the railroad. The business of Georgetown is positively drying up for want of railroad connection, and this is to give the connection which they want. There have been several cases there where citizens of Georgetown have built factories, business enterprises, and have absolutely failed for lack of these facilities. Men have been forced to go out of business because of not having railroad accommodations. Everybody wants it.

Mr. SULZER. Admitting what the gentleman says, that the people want the railroad extended, what assurance have we that the railroad will extend this line? It refused to do so before.

Mr. MORRELL. They are obliged under the terms of the bill to begin the work within sixty days, and the work must be completed within eighteen months.

Mr. SULZER. The railroad was obliged under the original charter, granted in 1889, to begin work and finish it within three years, and it did not do a thing.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes; but it did not oblige them to begin work within sixty days.

Mr. SULZER. Well, it had three years. It did nothing. Suppose it refuses to do anything within sixty days; what can the people do about it? Not a thing. It is the same old, old story. There is no penalty.

Mr. MORRELL. We put that provision in this bill after careful consideration.

Mr. SULZER. Suppose not a thing is done within sixty days, what then?

Mr. MORRELL. If they don't, then the charter lapses.

Mr. SULZER. Well, it lapsed before—fourteen years ago.

Mr. MORRELL. But the people of Georgetown want this accommodation. It is absolutely necessary for the business interests of Georgetown that this road should be built.

Mr. SULZER. Well, I shall not object, but these charters should be sold to the highest bidders for the best interests of all the people.

Mr. MORRELL. As it is to-day those interests are absolutely paralyzed for want of railroad accommodations. They have to haul their freight across Washington—some 5 miles.

Mr. SULZER. I undertake to say that if this charter was advertised for sale it could be sold.

Mr. MORRELL. No one else would touch this road for the reason that they would not have a connection. This is simply a short piece of road which goes from Georgetown and connects with a road already built through Maryland and Virginia.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MORRELL. I yield to my colleague from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say this: This bill has been amended as requested and demanded by the shippers in Georgetown over the strenuous opposition of the railroad people themselves and it is a small piece of road there that no independent line would seek in all probability, and we have now provided that if they do not build in eighteen months they forfeit their rights.

Mr. SULZER. They have already forfeited the charter.

Mr. SIMS. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. SULZER. They forfeited it in 1892.

Mr. SIMS. But there has been legislation since we gave them that time.

Mr. SULZER. No; there has been no legislation——

Mr. SIMS. That is my recollection; I may be mistaken. At any rate, if it is a new application it is exactly what the shippers there want. We are working in this case in the interests of the dear people over the strenuous opposition of the railroad company.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

CLASSIFYING OFFICERS AND MEMBERS OF THE FIRE DEPARTMENT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills reported from the District of Columbia Committee on the Union Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar reported from the District of Columbia Committee, Mr. MANN in the chair.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 4464 on the Calendar as unfinished business.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4464) to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been read and is now being considered by sections for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is in error, the Chair thinks. The bill is under consideration under general debate, and the bill has been read for the first time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was my understanding, and it was also my understanding that the——

The CHAIRMAN. If no gentleman desires to take the floor for general debate the Clerk will read the bill by sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the fire department of the District of Columbia shall embrace the whole of the said District, and its personal and movable property shall be assigned and located as the Commissioners of said District may direct within the appropriations made by Congress.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall appoint, assign to such duty or duties, promote, reduce, fine, suspend, with or without pay, and remove all officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia according to such rules and regulations as said Commissioners in their exclusive jurisdiction and judgment may from time to time make, alter, or amend: Provided, That the rules and regulations of the fire department heretofore promulgated are hereby ratified and shall remain in force until changed by said Commissioners.

SEC. 3. That the fire department of the District of Columbia shall consist of a superintendent, who shall, subject to the general supervision and direction of said Commissioners, have administrative supervision thereof; and also, as at present, of one chief engineer, one deputy chief engineer, such number of battalion chief engineers as said Commissioners may deem necessary from time to time within the appropriations made by Congress; one fire marshal; such number of deputy fire marshals, inspectors, and clerks as said Commissioners may deem necessary from time to time within the appropriations made by Congress; such number of captains and lieutenants as said Commissioners may deem necessary from time to time within the appropriations made by Congress; one superintendent of machinery; such number of assistant superintendents of machinery, engineers, assistant engineers, pilots, marine engineers, assistant marine engineers, drivers, privates of class No. 2, privates of class No. 1, and laborers as said Commissioners may deem necessary from time to time within the appropriations made by Congress; one superintendent of stables; such number of assistant superintendents of stables as said Commissioners may deem necessary from time to time within the appropriations made by Congress: Provided, That the superintendent of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall have the right to call for and obtain the services of any veterinary surgeon employed by the District who at the time shall not be engaged in a more emergent veterinary service for the District: And provided further, That the police surgeons of said District are required to attend, without charge, the members of the fire department of said District, and examine all applicants for appointment to, promotion in, and retirement from said fire department: Provided further, That until this act shall take effect the said fire department and its officers and members shall continue as at present, and shall be subject to existing rules and regulations.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 2, strike out all after the word "of" in line 7, down to and including the word "of," in line 10; also insert before the word "such," in line 12, the words "both of whom shall have had at least five years of experience in some regularly organized municipal fire department."

Page 2, line 24, insert before the word "privates" the words "assistant drivers;" strike out the comma after the word "two," in line 25, and insert "and."

Page 3, line 1, strike out the comma after the word "one;" also strike out the words "and laborers."

Page 3, strike out all, commencing with the semicolon after the word "Congress," in line 3, down to and including the word "Congress," in line 6, page 3; also strike out the word "superintendent," in line 6, page 3, and insert "chief engineer."

Page 3, strike out all, commencing with the colon after the word "department," in line 10, down to and including the word "regulations," in line 18.

The question was taken; and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the salary of the superintendent of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall be and continue annually at $4,000, unless changed by Congress, and shall begin at said rate per annum at the time of his appointment to office; the salaries of the other officers and members of said fire department herein provided shall commence, for the purposes of this act, with the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1906, and shall continue thereafter annually, unless changed by Congress, as follows: The chief engineer shall receive an annual salary of $3,500; the deputy chief engineer shall receive an annual salary of $2,500; battalion chief engineers shall each receive an annual salary of $2,000; the fire marshal shall receive an annual salary of $2,000; deputy fire marshals shall each receive an annual salary of $1,400; inspectors shall each receive an annual salary of $1,080; one clerk at an annual salary of $1,400; all other clerks shall each receive an annual salary of $1,200; captains shall each receive an annual salary of $1,400; lieutenants shall each receive an annual salary of $1,200; the superintendent of machinery shall receive an annual salary of $1,400; assistant superintendents of machinery shall each receive an annual salary of $1,200; engineers shall each receive an annual salary of $1,150; assistant engineers shall each receive an annual salary of $1,100; pilots shall each receive an annual salary of $1,150; marine engineers shall each receive an annual salary of $1,150; assistant marine engineers shall each receive an annual salary of $900; drivers shall each receive an annual salary of $1,100; privates of class No. 2 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,080; privates of class No. 1 shall each receive an annual salary of $960; laborers shall each receive an annual salary of $720; the superintendent of stables shall receive an annual salary of $1,080; assistant superintendents of stables shall each receive an annual salary of $900.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 4, line 5, strike out all after the word "that" down to and including the semicolon after the word "office" in line 9 on page 4; also strike out the word "other" in line 9, page 4.

Page 4, line 22, insert before the word "clerk" the word "chief."

Page 4, line 23, strike out the semicolon after the word "dollars;" also strike out the words "all other clerks shall each receive" and insert in lieu thereof "and one clerk at."

Page 5, line 15, strike out the word "nine" and insert the words "one thousand one."

Page 5, line 17, insert before the word "dollars" the words "and fifty;" also insert before the word "privates" the words "assistant drivers shall each receive an annual salary of one thousand one hundred dollars."

Page 5, strike out all, commencing with the semicolon after the word "dollars" in line 22, down to and including the word "dollars" in line 2, page 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the amendments on lines 22 and 24, page 4, be separated from the rest of the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there a request for the separation of any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the question on the other amendments in block. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments not named by the gentleman from New York in the section just read.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 22, page 4, before the word "clerk" insert "chief;" so it will read "one chief clerk."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to have the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill. This bill provides in section 3 that the Department shall——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I wish the gentleman would speak louder, so I can hear.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On page 2 in section 3 of the bill there is a provision that there shall be "such number of clerks as said Commissioner may deem necessary from time to time within the appropriations made by Congress." In the pending section there is pending an amendment to insert "chief," that there shall be one chief clerk with an annual salary of $1,400 and one clerk at an annual salary of $1,200.

I was going to suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill the propriety of eliminating from this bill reference to the compensation of clerks, either chief or otherwise, for this reason: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia, when the appropriation bill was being made up this year, did not ask for an additional clerk. They have one clerk now, at $1,000 a year. They did ask that his salary be increased $200. The House did not grant that increase. The bill went to the Senate. There was no request made there for an additional clerk, and as the appropriation bill has passed the Senate it provides for but one clerk, at $1,000 a year. If the compensation be not fixed in this law, from time to time it will be in the power of Congress under the provision to authorize such clerks and at such compensation as may be proper. If compensation be fixed in this act, it will take from Congress in the future the power to fix the compensation of these clerks. In view of the fact that both Houses of Congress have at this session passed upon the clerical help for the fire department and determined that one clerk, at $1,000 a year, is sufficient, it seems to me that the gentleman could well eliminate from this bill the provision for a chief clerk, at $1,400 a year, and an additional clerk, at $1,200, and leave to Congress and the future the power to provide such clerical help as may be required.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Answering the gentleman from New York, I can well see why, at first glance and without having given the consideration to the bill that the committee has given it, that he would take this position. The fact is that while the District appropriation bill was pending before his committee and before the Senate there was pending before the District Committee a bill to reorganize the fire department of the city, which provided that there should be a superintendent of the fire department, as provided for in section 4 of this bill, which the committee amended by striking the entire section out. Section 4 of the bill now under consideration before it was amended called for or created the office of superintendent, and the committee having the bill in charge, after considering the matter fully, giving long hearings on the question, decided that the creation of the superintendent's office would also call for clerks and stenographers, which will be provided for by the appropriation bills from year to year, and in lieu of the office of superintendent we created the offices of chief clerk and clerk. These two offices created by the District Committee in their amendment to the bill will answer, so the committee has thought, every purpose that could have been served by the office of superintendent with all of its clerks. And we thought that it was quite proper that the committee that had heard all phases of the question could well provide in the bill for these two offices. The appropriation bill having been passed, we could not hope to have these offices provided for by the Appropriations Committee until another year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, that the bill as it came from the Senate not only had a provision for a superintendent, at $4,000 a year, but had a provision for this clerk, at $1,400 a year.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. As it came back from the Senate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. The amendment that is suggested by the gentleman's committee in regard to the clerk is merely to insert the word "chief." When the Commissioners of the District were before the Committee on Appropriations they did not say they needed any additional clerks. They said that they were urging the readjustment of the salaries of the personnel of the department—officers and men—but there was no claim then made that they required any additional clerk hire. This bill was reported to the House and had passed the Senate before the appropriation bill was acted upon by the Senate committee or by the Senate itself. I have a copy of the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am sorry to say that this bill has not yet passed the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be granted five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was thinking of the appropriation bill. I meant to say as the bill was originally introduced. The District Commissioners also appeared before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, but evidently they asked for no additional help there, and it seems to me where the law authorizes Congress to give such clerks as may be necessary from time to time, and gives them power to fix the compensation, that then it can control properly the clerical help required. And there was no contention, and the Commissioners said that if the clerk that was there at present got $1,200 that would be ample and they would have no trouble at all.

The Commissioners did not say that they needed this extra help, this additional salary, and I am unable to understand why the committee should desire to force this additional compensation and additional help upon the department.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We are giving this additional clerk in lieu of a superintendent that the District Commissioners expected would be created in this bill at the time they were before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman from Kansas knows that there was absolutely no reason for the creation of the office known as "superintendent of the fire department." One of the Commissioners of the District takes charge of the fire department, and he in effect is head of it, and under him, as provided in this bill, will be a chief, at $3,500 a year, an assistant chief, at $2,500 a year, and a certain number of battalion chiefs; and there was absolutely no excuse for a superintendent and the clerical force as proposed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I agree perfectly with the gentleman from New York about that, and we struck the provision for it out and gave instead of it the clerk that the hearings before the committee showed was absolutely necessary to do the work that has to be done, and we give this additional clerk for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if the department had been able to do the work which it is called upon to do efficiently with one clerk up to this time that there is now no need for an additional clerk. Mr. Macfarland, one of the Commissioners, had this to say with reference to the funds of the department for clerical force when he was before the Committee on Appropriations:

Mr. MACFARLAND. You will see there is a recommendation for an increase in the salary of the clerk. We have one clerk at the fire department headquarters, and I have explained in another connection the responsibilities and the work which are upon this man. The man whom we had for years left us about three months ago to take an offer from a private corporation in New York, and I was informed by a member of his family the other day that he was now receiving $2,000 with this concern in New York.

Mr. GILLETT. You could not expect to keep him.

Mr. MACFARLAND. We did keep him all those years, and we could have kept him if we had given him $1,200.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is he a stenographer?

Mr. MACFARLAND. The present clerk is not a stenographer, but a typewriter.

Mr. GILLETT. What are his duties?

Mr. MACFARLAND. To handle all of the business that comes to that office—records, papers of all sorts, correspondence. He is the one clerk of the establishment. The chief also has a fireman detailed as his personal assistant, but the burden of the management of office business falls upon this man. As I say, this man just came into this office, but nevertheless the position is worth $1,200, and while this man is new, I press the recommendation.

It will be seen from this examination of the Commissioner that at no time during his examination did he suggest that any additional clerical help be furnished to the department. There are no more men in the department now than were in it when this examination took place; there is no more work to do now than then; there is no more need for additional clerks now than there was then, and there is no justice, in my judgment, in the creation of this position of chief clerk, and it ought, I submit, from a business standpoint, to be stricken from the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be agreed to. The Committee on the District of Columbia, I say with modesty, is quite——

Mr. MADDEN. The committee is always modest.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is quite as capable of going into a question affecting the welfare of the District of Columbia as the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MADDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. There is nobody questioning the gentleman's ability, integrity, or business judgment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And the District Committee did go into the question fully. When the Commissioner was giving the statement just read by the gentleman from Illinois, he had in mind the creation of the office of superintendent to do the work that is to be done by the chief clerk that we provide for in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Kansas be kind enough to tell the committee how he knows the Commissioner had in mind the creation of the office of superintendent?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Because at that time he was pressing the matter before the District Committee. If the gentleman will read the hearings before the District Committee, he will see that a large part of the hearings was taken up in the consideration of the creation of the office of superintendent

There is property running into the millions to be looked after; there are claims to be made; there is a great deal of very important business that was to have been done by the superintendent that is to be shifted from the Commissioner to this chief clerk, and it is the purpose that he should look after this business. I sincerely hope the committee will agree to this amendment that has been made to this bill after careful and serious consideration by the entire committee. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments, the first of which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, in line 22, insert, before the word "clerk," the word "chief."

On a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 25, noes 7.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the other amendment upon which a separate vote was demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, in lines 23 and 24, strike out the words "all other clerks shall each receive" and insert in lieu thereof "and one clerk at."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I ask for a vote on the amendment, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 7, with a committee amendment thereto.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

DAMAGES ON ACCOUNT OF UNION STATION GRADES.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14511) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for payment of damages on account of changes of grades due to the construction of the Union Station, District of Columbia, approved April 22, 1904.

The bill was read, with the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 5, insert, after the word "employed," the following: "Such compensation as shall be determined upon by the supreme court of the District of Columbia as equitable and commensurate with the services rendered, not exceeding."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

RAILROAD SIDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 19682) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to permit the extension and construction of railroad sidings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

BUILDING PERMITS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask present consideration of the bill (S. 4170) to amend an act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for prior years, and for other purposes."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for prior years, and for other purposes," be, and it is hereby, amended so that the first paragraph under the heading "District of Columbia" in said act shall read as follows:

"That the action of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in heretofore granting permits for the extension of any building or buildings, or any part or parts thereof, in the District of Columbia, beyond the building line and upon the streets and avenues of said city, is hereby ratified, without prejudice, however, to the legal rights of the Government in the event of the destruction by fire or otherwise of any such structure. And hereafter no such permits shall be granted except upon special application and with the concurrence of all of said Commissioners and, where such extensions are to be placed upon buildings to be erected on land adjoining United States public reservations, the approval of the Secretary of War."

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

UNIFORM BUILDING LINE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask present consideration of the bill (S. 59) providing for the establishment of a uniform building line on streets in the District of Columbia less than 90 feet in width.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to establish building lines on streets or parts of streets less than 90 feet wide, in the District of Columbia, upon the presentation to them of a plat of the street or part of street upon which such action is desired, showing the lots and the names of the record owners thereof, and accompanied by a petition of the owners of more than one-half of the real estate shown on said plat requesting that building lines be established, or when the Commissioners deem that the public interests require that such building lines be established: Provided, That no such building line shall be established on any part of street less than one block in length.

SEC. 2. That upon the filing of such plat and petition in the office of said Commissioners, or when the Commissioners shall deem that the public interests require it, the said Commissioners shall institute condemnation proceedings in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, by a petition in rem, particularly describing the land to be taken, which petition shall be accompanied by duplicate plats, to be prepared by the surveyor of said District, showing the location of said proposed building lines, the number of square feet to be taken from each lot or part of lot and the boundaries thereof in each square or block, and such other information as may be necessary for the purposes of such condemnation. Upon the filing of such petition, one copy of the plat, indorsed with the docket number of the case, shall be returned by the clerk of said court to the said surveyor for record in his office.

SEC. 3. That the condemnation proceedings herein provided for shall be in accordance with the provisions of sections 1608f to 1612, both inclusive, of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia as amended February 23, 1905, as far as the same are applicable; and that the assessment proceedings and assessment area for the establishment of building lines herein provided for shall be the same as that provided in section 1608j of said code for assessments in the opening, extension, widening, and straightening of alleys or minor streets, in the same manner as if the establishment of building lines had been included in said section.

SEC. 4. That said Commissioners, whenever they deem it desirable in the interest of economy, may permit buildings existing at the time said building lines are established and which project beyond said lines to remain until such time as the owner of said buildings desires to reconstruct or substantially alter the said buildings: Provided, That the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, providing for certain projections upon street parkings, shall apply to all parkings established under the act, and the control of said parkings otherwise shall be vested in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who are hereby authorized to make and enforce all reasonable and necessary regulations for their care and preservation.

SEC. 5. That the appropriation available for opening alleys and minor streets in the District of Columbia is hereby made available for the purpose of establishing building lines as provided for herein.

SEC. 6. That the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of building lines on certain streets in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 12, 1899, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

DAMAGES FOR RAILROAD GRADES.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17452) to provide for payment of damages on account of changes in grade due to the elimination of grade crossings on the line of the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 6. That said jury, after having viewed the property alleged to have been damaged, heard testimony offered by the parties interested, and appraised and determined the damages, shall make out a written verdict, to be signed by them, or a majority of them, and attested by the marshal, who shall return the same to the court and a copy thereof to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; that said verdict, when confirmed by the court, shall be final. The verdict of the jury may be excepted to by any party interested or by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and may be set aside by the court for good reasons and a new jury directed to be summoned.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to a matter back in a former section, I believe section 3. I got a copy of the bill as quickly as I could after I heard the language read. I find you make a limitation here, under which parties claiming damages must bring their actions within sixty days, I think.

Mr. OLCOTT. That is right.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose the individual is sick; sixty days is a very short time. I have had occasion to draw a grade bill, which became the law in my own State—the first piece of legislation I think I ever framed.

Mr. OLCOTT. What does the gentleman think is a proper time?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think twelve months at least. There are but few statutes otherwise; and, by the way, I have read the statutes of many States, including Massachusetts, and they very carefully guard the right of abutting owners, and, as a rule, make twelve months the limit, and we followed that example. Sixty days is too short, for, as I say, people might get sick, and for one cause and another not be able to comply with the law within that time.

Mr. OLCOTT. The committee, I think, will accept the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back for the purpose of making an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to recur to section 3 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to amend in lines 15 and 16, page 2, by striking out the words "sixty days" and inserting "twelve months."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, lines 15 and 16, strike out "sixty days" and insert the words "twelve months."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And also striking out "sixty days," wherever it occurs as that limitation, and inserting "twelve months."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 2, strike out "sixty days" and insert "twelve months."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the committee is ready to accept those amendments.

The amendments were considered and agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the members of said commission appointed under the provisions of this act shall receive for their services, when actually employed, the sum of $10 per day; and the jurors summoned by the marshal under the provisions of this act shall receive for their services, when actually employed, the sum of $5 per day. A sufficient sum to pay the compensation and expenses of said commission and the compensation and expenses of said jurors and the amount of such appraisements or awards of damages is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, and 50 per cent thereof shall be refunded to said District of Columbia by the United States.

The Clerk also read the following committee amendment:

Page 5, line 10, insert before the word "the" the following: "Such compensation as shall be determined upon by the supreme court of the District of Columbia as equitable and commensurate with the services rendered, not exceeding."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the provisions of section 9 of the act of Congress approved February 12, 1901, entitled "An act to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings on the line of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company in the city of Washington, D. C., and requiring said company to depress and elevate its tracks, and to enable it to relocate parts of its railroad therein, and for other purposes," so far as the same relate to any claims for damages of any kind whatsoever, whether resulting from change in grade or incidental to or connected therewith, or from the operation of said railroad company as contemplated and required by said act, to any property owner affected thereby, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and no property owner affected by any of the provisions of said act of Congress shall have any right to make any claim for damages by reason of any of the provisions of said act other than as may be granted by the provisions of section 3 of this act, and it is the intent of this act that such damages shall be limited only to actual damages due to the change in the grade of streets, avenues, and alleys provided for in said act of February 12, 1901, and that in allowing such damages the jury shall take into consideration all benefits referred to in section 5 of this act.

SEC. 9. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and they are hereby, repealed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making another observation. I see in this bill that you allow "all" benefits—that is, benefits in common and special benefits—to credit to damages done the damaged abutting owner. There are very few statutes in the United States that do this. I had occasion to investigate this subject when we enacted a grade statute by the legislature of Tennessee. The question of crediting damages for land actually "taken" and the incidental damages done in taking a right of way for a railroad was raised in the State of Tennessee, in about 1852, in the case of Woodfalk against the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad. The opinion of the court is reported in second Swan's Report, and is alluded to by Lewis on Eminent Domain as one of the leading authorities on the subject. It is often cited by courts of sister States. It has since been followed by the supreme court of Tennessee in considering questions of eminent domain and grade statutes.

My recollection is that the charter of the railroad gave it the right to credit the value of the land taken for the right of way with "benefits in common," which would be in such a case railroad privileges, general enhancement of property, etc., in the neighborhood, because they would be shared by everybody and therefore a benefit in common. However, the supreme court, then composed of Judges Caruthers, Totten, and McKinney, very able men, rendered an opinion, delivered by Judge Caruthers, holding that the land taken by the railroad had to be paid for in "money" and not in benefits, common or special. "Just compensation," held the court, meant "money" and not benefits, and the court declared further that it would be a travesty on justice, an oppressive inequality, a denial to the citizen whose land is taken of the protection guaranteed to him by the Constitution, to compel him, force him to surrender his land, give up the title thereto, be dispossessed, and be paid for his property in "benefits" of any kind, common or special.

Mr. Chairman, under such a rule the citizen could be compelled to give up his land and be forced also to accept pay therefor in something that he did not need or want, something that to him was not and could not be a benefit. The citizens, argued the court, if I remember the opinion, whose lands were NOT taken or damaged or applied to the right of way enjoyed the benefit of the railroad privileges it proposed to accord and the general enhancement of property by the building of the road as much so as if their property had been taken, damaged, or applied, as Woodfalk's was, and yet Woodfalk was paying for it all.

The word "damage" does not appear in the constitution of Tennessee; the old words "taken or applied" do. The citizen was and is entitled to the railroad privileges—general enhancement of property by the building of the road—because they were and are "citizens" and taxpayers and because their legislature had given this charter to better their condition. Of course the legislature would not and should not have given this charter if the railroad proposed no railroad privileges and proposed to destroy everybody's property.

The court in this case also discussed, if it did not define, the terms "benefits in common" and "special benefits." And by these definitions I say and contend that a street, whether good or bad, is a benefit in common, because it is a public highway, open to everyone; and whether the citizen gets a good street or not, when he pays his taxes he pays them for the purpose of getting a good street, and when he does not get it he is not getting his just dues as a taxpayer. A special benefit is one that is enjoyed by the landowner—is not enjoyed by the public at large, by the public in common. For example, if the city drains a pond from one's premises in building a street, you would specially benefit his property, and the "incidental" damages done his property by building the street would be offset, and properly, by the "incidental" benefit done his property by reason of draining this pond.

Judge Caruthers discussed, in this very learned opinion, the question of benefits, and states that the question of how "incidental damages" shall be paid for, whether offset by benefits or not, is a question for the legislature to decide. But when the legislature decides that "all" benefits, as this bill provides, shall offset all or any kind of damages, it is too sweeping, it is wrong, it is not just law, certainly we should not make it law. It is right and proper to offset special damages by special benefits, but not special damages by benefits in common. As a taxpayer the property owner is entitled to the benefit in common—to the good street, in other words. If you damaged his property by building a good street where there was a bad one, you certainly should not offset the special damages to his property by saying, "Here is a good street where there was a bad one before," because, as a taxpayer, he has already paid not only to have a street, but a good street, and when you damage his property and then pay him off by saying, "Here is a good street where there was either a good one or bad one before," you make him pay for the good street twice—that is, by taxation, and, second, by damaging or taking his property.

The street is for everybody to pass over. It is as much for the benefit of the community at large whose property may not be damaged at all as it is for the abutting owner whose property is partially damaged or totally destroyed. A street, in other words, is a benefit in common.

The common-law rule, that no damages could be recovered by an abutting owner where the municipality changes the grade of a street, is harsh law. But it was early so decided by Massachusetts. I remember the case of Callender against Marsh, reported in Pickering's Reports. You will there see another case, Humes against Knoxville, decided by the supreme court of Tennessee, reported in one of the Humphrey reports. This rule was so harsh that at an early day these States, and in many other States, the legislatures passed immediately statutes giving the damaged party a right of action and right to recover from any damages done incidentally or otherwise by changing the grade of the street, whether it was raised or reduced. The courts have invariably, certainly so in Tennessee, construed these statutes "liberally" in favor of the property owner for several reasons, one being that one person or two, or a dozen, should not have their property taken, damaged, or applied for the benefit of the general public, the building of a good street, or opening one, and those few persons stand all the damage, losing their property, and be paid therefor in good streets already paid for in taxes. The whole public should be burdened to build streets, and no one person should be made to bear that burden.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee what his proposed amendment is?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was making an observation, to wit, that the word "all" should be stricken out. I am going to ask the committee to let me amend by striking out the word "all" and substitute the word "special." Then if you do an abutting owner any special benefit you can credit the special damages with it. Do not ruin a man's property and then pay him off in benefits that he has already paid for in taxes. My amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to strike out the word "all" and substitute the word "special."

[2 Swan's Reports, p. 422. Nashville, December term, 1852. Woodfolk v. Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company.]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Compensation to owner of property which has been taken for public use; how and in what way to be made: Where the legislature, in the exercise of the power conferred by the constitution, assumes to appropriate the property of a private individual to a public use, in the construction of a railroad, it can not prescribe how much and what way the owner shall be compensated for the property so appropriated. The value of the property taken must be assessed by a just and proper tribunal, and the amount paid in money. It is a debt against those who take the property, and must be paid as all other debts. The owner thus deprived of his property can not be coerced to receive as compensation ameliorations of his remaining property or the enhancement of its value or any other "benefit or advantage," either real or imaginary, that may be conferred upon him. The measure of the compensation to be made to the owner in such case is the fair cash value of the property taken, at the place and in the form taken. The incidental damages or benefits which are to result to him from whom the property is taken from the use to which it is to be applied form no element in the computation of the compensation. So far as such incidental benefits and damages are involved, the legislature may make such regulations as are deemed proper in the way of placing one as a set-off against the other.

Meigs, Ewing, and Cooper for plaintiff in error. F. B. Fogg, for defendant in error. Judgment lower court reversed.

Caruthers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants located their road for about 500 feet on a 6-acre lot of plaintiff in the vicinity of Nashville. The road runs through the corner of the lot, separating about three-fourths of an acre from the main lot and occupying in the bed, which is from 7 to 10 feet deep, about three-fourths of an acre. The plaintiff has his family residence on the lot, and it is handsomely and tastefully improved. The part separated has upon it some negro houses, a cow house, well, and spring house. The plaintiff applied to the circuit court of Davidson County, under the act of 1845, chapter 1, chartering said company, for the appointment of commissioners to assess the damages sustained by him in consequence of the location of said road upon his land. This was at May term, 1850, when five commissioners were appointed.

At October term, 1850, the report made by said commissioners was quashed for informalities in their proceedings, and five other men appointed.

A majority of these commissioners "assess the loss and damage at $2,000," and that the "benefit and advantage the said Woodfolk has received from said road, consisting of the increased value of his said premises, amounts to the sum of $2,500 at least." So they allow him nothing.

From this report he appealed to the court, and the cause was tried by a special jury, before the court, at January term, 1852. A verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for $750. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and appeal in error to this court.

The injuries enumerated are of this character: Cutting off the plaintiff from his well, spring house, etc.; the necessity of moving outbuildings, erecting a stone wall in the cut made for the road, to keep up the ground and prevent accidents; detracting from the beauty and comfort of the lot as a family residence, etc.

Against all this, on the other hand, it is proved that his lot is enhanced in value in the market by the erection of the road from 25 to 50 per cent. On all these points the proof is, as it must be when consisting of the opinions of men on any subject, very conflicting and unsatisfactory on all the items of account on both sides. It must necessarily partake more of the nature of guessing than of certainty.

CIRCUIT JUDGE, CHARGE OF.

The law was laid down by the circuit judge in his charge, in part and so far as it is necessary in our examination, as follows:

"You will recur to the testimony and ascertain from that the value of the land taken from the road, and take into consideration such other inconveniences and damages as shall have resulted to the plaintiff from the acts of defendant. You will estimate what damages the plaintiff may have suffered, if you shall think that any have accrued. Then you will look to the testimony in the cause and ascertain whether the acts of the defendant in locating the road upon the land of the plaintiff have resulted in benefit or advantage to him. On ascertaining this, you will determine whether the lands of the plaintiff have appreciated in value. You will not look to the fact that this road is a public benefit or advantage unless that public benefit or advantage be inseparable from the benefit conferred upon the plaintiff. If any advantages have resulted, you will determine what they are and assess their value. You will then take the amount of benefit or advantage from the amount of damages, and the remainder, if any, will make your verdict. In ascertaining the benefits and damages you will confine yourself to the time when the defendants appropriated the land of the plaintiff to the use and construction of the road."

BOTH PARTIES DISSATISFIED.

Thus is the law laid down by the circuit court, and both parties are dissatisfied with it. The defendant brings up the case by appeal and the plaintiff by writ of error. It now devolves upon this court to settle the law and indicate the proper rules for this and all other cases of the kind; and there will doubtless be many in future, as the spirit of public improvement has now taken possession of the minds of the people and guides the public counsels of our State. They should be such as will guard the rights of the citizens on one hand and not improperly impede the cause of public improvement on the other. A wide range has been taken in the argument, evincing learning, research, and ability on the part of the counsel, worthy of the importance of the subject as well as profitable to the court. We feel much indebted to this full and able examination and presentation of the questions involved, both upon principle and authority, for the opinion we have been able to form on this most vexed and perplexing subject. We have had the advantage of all the lights that could be brought to the elucidation of the questions involved by the best legal talents and most profound research.

RIGHTS OF PUBLIC AND THE PROPERTY OWNER.

It would at this day be worse than useless to enter into a discussion of the existence and extent of the right of eminent domain and to prove that it is inherent in this and all other governments. That is now well settled and admitted on all hands to exist in every state and country. No one now questions the right of the state to take private property for public use against the consent of the owner. Questions frequently arise, and may come up again, as to the extent and right exercise of this conceded power.

RIGHT OF PUBLIC LIMITED.

But it is not controverted that it applies to the case of public roads, and that railroads, whether constructed by the state or chartered companies are of that character. The land of the plaintiff has been taken for this purpose, and was therefore legally and rightfully taken.

OWNER'S RIGHTS GUARDED.

But he has a corresponding right, which is as clear, well guarded, and indisputable as the other—a claim for the value of his property. the state may take his property for the public use, but the state must see that the public pays him for it. The people, in whom the sovereign power properly resides in this free country, were not willing to leave this dangerous though essential right of eminent domain (a power to deprive a man of his property against his consent) unguarded by barriers of a permanent nature and inserted in their Constitution restrictions upon it.

They impliedly delegate the right, but protect the citizen, and secure to him the value of his private property. The provision for this purpose in the Federal Constitution is:

Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation. (Amendments, Art. V.)

But this, as well as other provisions of the same character, are intended solely as limitations on the exercise of power by the General Government, and is not applicable to the legislation of the States. The State constitutions are framed by different persons, and have distinct objects in view. The State governments are not restricted in the limitation of a power expressed in general terms in the Constitution of the United States. The States must be included in terms or necessary implication in such limitation or negation of powers, or they are not affected. (Barros v. The Mayor of Baltimore, 7 Pet., 243; 2 J. J., Mar., 45.)

PEOPLE JEALOUS OF ABUSE OF POWER—CONSTITUTION.

The Constitution of the United States can not, therefore, be looked to for the rule to govern us in this case. But the people of this State, and, perhaps, most, if not all the others, being equally jealous of the abuse of power saw proper to restrict and limit the power of the State government on the same subject. Our people in their State convention make this provision:

"No man's particular services shall be demanded or property taken or applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, or without just compensation being made therefor." (Art. 1, sec. 21.)

POWER TO TAKE PROPERTY LIMITED.

The power to take private property for "public use" is here impliedly admitted, and the legislature undoubtedly possess it with the limitation prescribed—that is, by making just compensation. This is only in affirmance of the great principles of the common law. The important and only question in this case is what is meant by "just compensation."

NO SUBSTITUTE FOR COMPENSATION.

How is it to be ascertained, and how, when, and in what paid? When this is settled upon a fair construction of that instrument, it must prevail, and no act of assembly can change or alter it. All laws are subordinate to this supreme law, and must yield to it, as they are null and void when they come in conflict with it. It follows, therefore, that if the legislature attempted in this charter to substitute any other compensation for private property taken for this road, or directly, or by indirection, deprived the citizen of that "just compensation," in whole or in part, which is secured in the organic law, it has transcended its authority and trespassed upon sacred ground. If it should be our opinion that this has been done, it becomes an imperious duty, delicate and unpleasant as it may be, to sustain the Constitution, which we have sworn to support, with a firm hand. That must stand, no matter what else may fall. It must be guarded with untiring and sleepless vigilance from all attacks. Upon the judiciary this important duty devolves. The people can only look to this department of the Government for protection when their constitutional rights are invaded. It should be a pleasant though delicate duty to those they have thus intrusted with the power to exert it on all proper occasions for their security against wrong.

"JUST COMPENSATION" DISCUSSED.

Then what is the power of the State and the rights of the citizen? is the question now before us. The former may take the private property of the latter for public use, as has been done in this case. The citizen has a concomitant right, founded in the Constitution, to a "just compensation." How is this right to be asserted? It is certainly the duty of the Government to provide some fair and proper mode of ascertaining the value of the property taken where it can not be agreed upon by the parties, and to make provision also for the payment when it is ascertained in the mode and manner contemplated by the Constitution.

CHARTERED RIGHTS DISCUSSED.

The charter of the defendant was granted in 1845 (ch. 1). The twenty-fourth section regulates the mode of ascertaining the damages to individuals, and the manner of compensating them for lands taken for the road. It provides that where the land can not be purchased or the price agreed upon, "the same may be taken at a valuation to be made by five commissioners, or a majority of them, to be appointed by the circuit court of the county where some part of the land, or right of way, is situated," who shall take an oath "faithfully and impartially to discharge the duty assigned them. In making the said valuation the said commissioners shall take into consideration the loss or damage which may occur to the owner or owners in consequence of land being taken or the right of way surrendered, and also the benefit or advantage he may receive from the erection or establishment of the railroad or work, and shall state particularly the nature and amount of each, and the excess of loss or damage over and above the benefit and advantage shall form the measure of valuation of said land or right of way. The proceedings of said commissioners, accompanied with a full description of said land, or right of way, shall be returned under the hands and seals of the majority to the court from which the commission issued, there to remain of record."

APPEALS ALLOWED.

Either party may appeal and have a new valuation by a jury in court, where verdict shall be final unless a new trial is granted. "And the lands, or right of way, so valued by the commissioners, or jury, shall vest in the said company in fee simple so soon as the valuation may be paid, or where refused, may be tendered."

APPEALS NOT TO STOP IMPROVEMENT.

It is further provided that an appeal is not to stop the work, nor can the same be delayed by injunction or supersedeas. But in case the appeal is by the company surety must be given to pay whatever may be awarded in the court.

VIGOROUS EXERCISE OF POWER OF EMINENT DOMAIN.

Here is a full and vigorous exercise of the power of eminent domain. The fee-simple title is vested in the corporation. No objection is made, nor do we see any, under the construction that a jury trial, in the regular common-law mode, is adopted in case of appeal to the provision made in this section for settling the rights of the parties. But the contested and embarrassing question still arises upon the rule prescribed in this law for ascertaining the "just compensation" to the owner of the land, the use and title of which he is thus forced to surrender to the corporation. On the one hand, in making the valuation of the land, the "loss or damages" which may accrue to the owner by taking the land "is to be fixed;" on the other, the "benefit or advantage" to the owner from the erection of the road is to be estimated, and the excess of the former over the latter, in the language of the act, "shall form the measure of the valuation of said land."

BENEFITS AS "COMPENSATION" DISCUSSED.

Is this measure of "compensation" prescribed in the Constitution? Was the compensation secured to the owner for the loss of his property to be paid in money or may it be made in other property or incidental "benefits and advantages?" Was it intended that the citizen should not only be forced to give up his land for the common or public use, but to take in payment for it anything it might suit the party taking it to offer? If such be the true meaning of the Constitution, it is certainly a poor protection of private rights against the exactions of power and is only calculated to excite false hopes of security. By the supreme law the legislature are empowered, where, in their opinion, the good of the whole people requires it and for the use and benefit of the whole, to compel him who owns property to give it up upon the payment to him by the same public for whose use it is taken a "just compensation," or, in other words, a fair price, or the value in money, for the property taken.

LAND TAKEN MUST BE PAID IN LAWFUL COIN—MONEY.

He can not be paid off in "benefits and advantages," which are thus forced upon him, against his consent. He may be compelled to submit to the encroachment upon his private rights when they come thus in conflict with the public interest, but, with the charter of his liberties in his hand, he can say to the powers that be, "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther." In the appropriation of the property the public power is exhausted. It can not be allowed to prescribe how much and what he shall be paid. The value of the thing taken must be assessed by a just and proper tribunal and the amount paid in the lawful coin of the United States—in money. It is a debt against those who take the property and must be paid like all other debts. The creditor in this case can not be coerced to receive as compensation ameliorations of his remaining property for the enhancement of its value, nor any other "benefit or advantage," either real or imaginary, that may be conferred upon him. He may not wish to part with a portion of his land to have the price of that which remains enhanced. The increase of price without any improvement of its fertility or beauty is no advantage to him if he does not wish to sell; it only increases his public burdens in the way of taxation. What others might regard as a great "advantage and benefit" he might consider a decided injury. If his lands are appreciated and his facilities of travel and trade increased by this improvement, these are benefits to which he is entitled, with the community in general, and for which he has to pay, in common with others, in taxes and other burdens. But there can be no good reason why any more should be taken from him than others for these common benefits.

CONCLUSION OF THE COURT.

Then we arrive at the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to the value of the land taken from him by the defendants in money, and that this value, when ascertained, can not be liquidated, in whole or in part, by any "benefit or advantage" he may, in fact or by supposition, derive from the making of the road in the appreciation of his remaining land or otherwise. But, on the other hand, it would be unjust to make the public pay the enhanced price that would result from the fact that the road had been located at that place.

WHAT LANDOWNER IS ENTITLED TO AS A CITIZEN.

It is difficult to lay down any very definite rule for the government of commissioners and juries on this subject which will be of easy, practical application in every case. Yet it is highly important that some principle be settled and the extent of its application to peculiar circumstances defined calculated to produce uniformity and rid the subject of that vague and indefinite character which now seems to perplex the minds of those who have to act upon it. We consider the proper rule to be this, that the fair cash value of the land taken for public use, if the owner were willing to sell and the company desired to buy that particular quantity at that place and in that form, would be the measure of compensation. It is not in the nature of a wrongful taking for which damages are to be assessed. Nor is it a claim for any wrong or damage done, but the appropriation of the property is legal and rightful, as much so as if the owner had voluntarily sold it to the company, and the only open question was, What is a fair price for the property? What is its value?

Now, from this definition of the nature of the transaction it will follow that there can be nothing added to the price on account of the unwillingness of the owner to part with his land or to have the improvement there, or because he may have to build fences and walls or be put to inconvenience in getting to his outbuildings or have them to remove or such like inconveniences. These things do not enter into a just idea of a just compensation for the property actually taken, but are incidental to it, and are provided for in another form by this charter, as will be presently shown. These considerations are not to enter into the estimate of the jury to enhance the price, but, on the other side, the value is not to be reduced by the consideration that the improvement about to be made will be advantageous to the owner in the amelioration and enhanced value of his remaining land, the increased facility in travel or trade it will afford him, or the location of a depot or town upon his land. To all these and such other incidental advantages as may result to him he is entitled, in common with other citizens, and for which he pays in taxes and other legal burdens imposed by government. If such special advantages accrue to him in consequence of the public improvement and that particular location of the road, it is an incident to his right of property and a benefit for which no one has a right to make him account in fixing the price of other property taken against his will. The following circumstances and considerations should enter in this estimate of value or compensation:

RULE WHERE LAND IS "TAKEN."

1. The quantity of land taken. It would not be reasonable to fix the price of 1 acre, or the fourth of an acre, at the general rate of the whole tract or a larger quantity. This would be selling by retail, and ought to be at a higher price for the quantity taken.

2. The place where the land lies which is thus appropriated, with reference to external circumstances. Is it in the country, a village, or city? With reference to remaining land, is it taken on the outer line, with the bed of the road only on the land, or does it run so as to divide the land in a regular or awkward form, through a garden, stable lot, or the family yard, between the dwelling house and kitchen, or under either of them; and if so, are they of great value or of but little value? Is it so run as to cut off from the main lot a portion of ground that for quantity or form is salable or not? So upon this point the rule must be as first laid down in general terms—the quantity taken and place and form in which it is taken must be looked to in fixing its value.

3. Any general effect that the actual or contemplated erection of the railroad, or special effect of the location of it at that particular place, may have upon the value of that land, whether it has been to improve or lessen the price, is not to form an element or be considered in the valuation. If the value is elevated by the work, he should not have the advantage of it, because we do not make him account for the increased value of the remainder of his land, and if the value is reduced by it he should not suffer, because he is forced to part with his property for that purpose against his will.

INCIDENTAL BENEFITS LEFT OUT WHEN LAND IS TAKEN.

4. The incidental advantages and disadvantages, benefits and injuries are to be left entirely out of view, the owner's unwillingness to sell, or to the location of the road on his land, or near his house, on the one hand, and the necessity the public is under to have the land at that particular place, on the other, are to have no influence on the price. The property is to be valued on the same principles and considerations as if both parties had agreed upon the sale and had referred the single question of the intrinsic value of that particular property to the commissioners. The consideration for his property, to which the owner is entitled, being thus ascertained, it must be paid to him in money. To compel him to take anything else would render the constitutional guaranty ineffectual and delusive.

WHAT THE LEGISLATURE MAY DO.

Here the constitutional provision ends; its inhibition upon the Government goes no further. The legislature may make any regulations it thinks right and proper for an account or estimate of incidental "loss or damage" or injuries to the landowner. These may consist of the necessity created for the building of new fences, the removal of buildings, separating him from his spring, well, mills, negro houses, barns, etc. And against this may be set off the "benefits and advantages" to the owner in the enhancement of the value of his remaining land of the same or any adjoining tract, his increased facilities of travel, etc. We think the legislature have the power to do this, and if required by the petitioner, the court would be bound, under this charter, to direct the commissioners, or in case of appeal, the jury, to make the estimate on both sides upon the basis here stated. But this must be separate and distinct from the valuation of the land for the purpose of ascertaining the compensation required by the constitution and can not be blended with it or in any way enlarge or reduce it. It is true that the nature of the items on both sides of this account would be a very vague and indefinite character, depending before commissioners upon their opinions, upon the view and examination of the ground, and before a jury, on appeal, upon the opinions and fancy of witnesses. But for that no remedy or definite rule can be furnished which will clear the subject of its inherent difficulties. But this enhancement of the price, which may be taken into the account against the petitioner, must be confined in the estimate to the lot or tract through which the road runs or to lots or land which adjoin it, and to such improvement in value as is the result of running the road at that particular place and not to the general rise of property in the country or that neighborhood produced by the public work. That which is common to all should not be charged to him, because this is an advantage to which he is entitled as a citizen and taxpayer of the State.

To these conclusions we are brought by what seems to us a fair construction of our own constitution. And we find that we are fully sustained in them by the court of appeals of the State of Kentucky, in the case of Jacob v. The City of Louisville, 9 Dana, 114. In that case it is stated that the same principles had been adopted in Sutton's Heirs v. The City of Louisville, 5 Dana, 28, and in Rice v. Nicholasville, Danville and Lancaster Turnpike Company, 7 Dana, 81. The language used in the constitution of Kentucky is substantially the same as ours on this subject.

We are aware that in some of the States contrary and conflicting views have been entertained on some of the points now decided. It would be a useless extension of this opinion to review them, as it would be productive of no advantage. The diversity presented may be partly attributed to the different constitutional provisions on the subject and to the fact that some of the State constitutions are entirely without any such provisions. And, again, the legislative enactments and the form in which the questions have been presented to the courts have been so variant and dissimilar that the diversity seems at first view to be greater than it really is upon closer examination.

But we are fully satisfied with the construction now given, and though we entertain very great respect for decisions of other States, we can not yield to them as authority any further than they are sustained in our judgment by sound reason and settled principles.

For the errors in law above indicated, in the charge of the court below, we reverse the judgment in this case and remand the cause for a new trial on the principles laid down in this opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "all" in line 15 and insert the word "special."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this bill is brought in to cover an omission of the Union Station bill, and follows the law that is now on the statute books governing the other parts of the city outside of the southwest. If you amend this bill in the particular mentioned, you will have one law governing the northeast and another governing the southwest of the city.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That may be true; but simply because we have not the right sort of law to cover the balance of the city is no reason why we should not go along and make a better law now. Of course I am totally disinterested in the matter, except as a lawmaker. You will find the fewest number of statutes that have this language. A large majority say "special benefits." If you specially benefit him, offset the special damage with the specific benefit and pay him the difference, but don't charge him with special benefits and benefits in common also. He pays for the common benefit—the good street you build—when he pays his taxes. That is the law, and that is just and fair. In other words, this bill makes him pay twice. He pays for the good street in taxes and damages, too.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask my friend if that is not largely a matter for the construction of the court?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no; when you say "all benefits." There are only two kinds of benefits, and one is special and the other common. It is perfectly clear.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It goes to the kind of benefits.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Special benefits. For instance, when you drain a pond and better a home. A benefit in common would be a "good street"—a way in common. I mean some special betterment is a special benefit. That is not one in common, but when you come along and better the street, he pays for that when he pays his taxes. You come along and destroy his property and say, "Well, we put you in a good street." Then, you see, you double tax him. You tax him to get the good street at first, and then you tax him to get another good street in lieu, and yet you have destroyed his property. That is the upshot of it all. The old supreme court of Pennsylvania—and I never shall forget its opinion, because it is almost like a sermon on the mount—denounced the hard rule of the common law, damnum absque injuria, in such cases and said the common law should be changed by statute. That was done, I think. They did it also in Tennessee and in Massachusetts, abrogating the holding in the case of Callender against March, reported in one of the Pickerings.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that my colleague will insist on this amendment if he thoroughly understands it. This is with reference to the law abolishing grade crossings. The railroad tracks have been elevated and depressed, as provided. The benefits are nearly all special, from the fact that it is a benefit growing out of removing dangerous grade crossings. It does not apply to the whole city, but only to the lines the railroads occupy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Was there not a good street there, anyway?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no. We are making better streets by getting rid of the grade crossings.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then the people in that neighborhood have not been getting the benefit of the previous tax they have paid.

Mr. SIMS. If my colleague will only go down and see the tracks removed by that legislation, he will see that they have been very specially beneficial to those streets. Besides, the question of damages is passed on by a jury of citizens who sympathize with those sustaining damage.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will agree that when a taxpayer pays his tax he pays it to get good streets.

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You go along and make a good street, and yet you damage his property, say, $500. Say you lower the grade. You go along and say, "We have made you a good street here and it is worth $500 to your property; I will admit that you are damaged in one sense, but this street is worth that much to your land." There is his property damaged $500, and here are his taxes gone also, and he has nothing to show for it but the good road.

Mr. SIMS. The case is not applicable. If the gentleman will go along where we have caused this railroad to either put the tracks up or put them down, he will see that it is in every case a benefit. The streets were in many cases very dangerous.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Let me cite my friend to a case I know that he remembers. He will remember that we cut down Front street, in Nashville, in some places 12 feet (to build a dummy car line), in order to get down under the railroad tracks. Of course after a while they came up on the level. I brought suit for damages. The people where the land was not damaged said, "We have a better street here; the city and the street cars have made a better street," and that, therefore, because these folks have their land reduced 12 feet, they ought not to require the city to pay any damages. They put in that kind of a defense, but I won all of the cases, because the court held that you could not charge up a common benefit, a benefit in common, a good street, and damage a man's property also and pay him for it in those sort of benefits—that is, when he paid his taxes, he paid his taxes to get that good street.

Mr. SIMS. I hope the Chair will not count this time up against me. Your case does not apply. Here are a lot of railroad tracks running across the streets at grade. Buggies, carriages, and wagons have to run over them. Now, when we, by this law, have removed these tracks——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the committee contend that because the tracks were on the streets at grade and because they are going to be removed from grade that the property abutting the streets upon which these tracks run should be obliged to pay the expense of putting the tracks away from the grade?

Mr. SIMS. No——

M. MADDEN. Does the committee contend that the railroad company should not be obliged to put its tracks in a safe condition for the public and pay such expenses as may be connected with the change without reference to any charge upon the people?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Illinois had only been here when we enacted that legislation he would have seen how hard I tried to get that kind of a law passed, but we are acting on a law already passed, which does not put upon the railroad——

Mr. MADDEN. Why do you pass this law, then?

Mr. SIMS. This law is to make it apply to certain sections of the city; in other words, to make it uniform. When you remove the railroad tracks off a street and off a lot, the lot was worth, say, a hundred dollars with the tracks on it and $500 with the tracks off. Now, in assessing damages to the lot, should it not be considered that the lot has been benefited by this legislation by the removal of those tracks, which increased its value, maybe, 500 per cent, and while the railroad ought to have paid it there is no law to make them. The act was passed and the legislation has gone into effect.

Mr. MADDEN. You are passing a law now to regulate a thing to be affected now. The law affecting this has not passed yet.

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, if the other law compelled a condition that ought not to exist why not pass a law——

Mr. SIMS. Because every one of these parties whose claims have been adjusted would come to Congress for a special appropriation to pay them back amounts charged as general benefits and put them on the same basis as those who may be charged with special benefits only.

Mr. MADDEN. The law as passed regulating the removal of these grade crossings cost the Government of the United States four million two hundred and some odd-thousand dollars, and my view is it ought not to have cost the Government one cent.

Mr. SIMS. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. If we made a mistake then, do not let us repeat it again.

Mr. SIMS. What we are doing by this bill is in the nature of protection to the Treasury by charging up general benefits, therefore reducing the claims to that extent that might be made and therefore protecting the Treasury of the United States and the District of Columbia to that extent. That is the reason why I am contending against the amendment and I think there should be nothing paid out of the Treasury on account of this legislation, and therefore I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 28.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and five gentlemen are present—a quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment. I will send and get that Woodfork case that so ably discussed this question and differentiates between special and general benefits and I want to ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD for the information and use of the House on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert some excerpts from the opinion stated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have objected to this sort of thing for ten years and I am going to keep on objecting, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

PREVENTION OF COMMUNICABLE DISEASES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I call up House bill 16668.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16868) for the prevention of scarlet fever, diphtheria, measles, whooping cough, chicken pox, epidemic cerebro-spinal meningitis, and typhoid fever in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person in charge of any patient in the District of Columbia who is suffering from diphtheria, scarlet fever, measles, whooping cough, chicken pox, epidemic cerebro-spinal meningitis, or typhoid fever, immediately after becoming aware of the existence of such disease, shall send to the health officer of said District a certificate, written in ink, signed by such person, stating the name of the disease, the name, age, sex, and color of the person suffering therefrom, and the school which he or she has attended, if any, and setting forth by street and number, or by other sufficient designation, the location of the house, room, or other place in which said patient can be found. When said patient recovers, or dies, said person in charge, as soon as possible thereafter, shall send to the health officer of said District a certificate, written in ink, certifying to that fact. But no person shall certify knowlingly or negligently that any patient has recovered from any disease aforesaid until such patient is in such condition as to be free from danger of communicating the disease from which he is suffering to other persons.

SEC. 2. The term "person in charge of any patient," as used in this act, shall be held to mean, first, each physician in attendance on, called in to visit, or examining a patient, unless called in to visit or examining the patient solely as a consultant to a physician already in attendance; second, in the absence or disability of any physician aforesaid, the head of the family to which the patient belongs; third, in the absence or disability of such person, the nearest relative or relatives of such patient present on the premises and in attendance on such patient; fourth, in the absence or disability of all persons aforesaid, every person in attendance on such patient; and, fifth, in the absence of every person aforesaid, every person in charge of the premises in which said person is. And in the cases of physicians and of persons acting in the capacity of physicians, attending, visiting, or examining any patient suffering from any disease aforesaid shall be prima facie evidence that any person so doing was aware of the nature of such disease.

SEC. 3. That any person who violates or aids or assists in violating any of the provisions of this act shall be punished, upon conviction thereof, by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not more than thirty days, and each and every day during which such violation continues shall constitute a separate and distinct offense. Prosecutions under this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia on information signed by the corporation counsel of said District or by one of his assistants.

SEC. 4. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to make such regulations as they deem necessary for the prevention of the spread of diphtheria, scarlet fever, measles, whooping cough, chicken pox, epidemic cerebro-spinal meningitis, and typhoid fever, and to affix to such regulations such penalties as in the judgment of said Commissioners are necessary to secure compliance therewith.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect from and after sixty days after its passage, and from and after the expiration of said period an act entitled "An act to prevent the spread of scarlet fever and diphtheria in the District of Columbia," approved December 20, 1890, and an act entitled "An act to require cases of typhoid fever occurring in the District of Columbia to be reported to the health department of said District," approved February 4, 1902, and all other acts and parts of acts contrary to the provisions of this act or inconsistent therewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and any money available at the time of said repeal for the execution and enforcement of the acts named be, and hereby is, made available for the execution and enforcement of the provisions of this act and of regulations made by authority thereof; but for any act done or omitted in violation of the provisions of either of the acts named above prior to the repeal of said acts prosecutions may be instituted, and if already instituted may be continued, in accordance with the provisions of said acts, notwithstanding that said act has been repealed for all purposes other than the institution and the continuance of such prosecutions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (during the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of making a suggestion, I shall move to strike out the last word. Before we get all of this read I would like some one to tell us what it is, what it is intended to be, and what evil it is going to cure.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman from Tennessee will wait until the bill is read, I will endeavor to make an explanation of it.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 2, strike out the semicolon after the word "patient," in line 19; and also strike out, in lines 19, 20, and 21, the words "and, fifth, in the absence of every person aforesaid, every person in charge of the premises in which said patient is."

Page 3, strike out the comma after the word "days," in line 5; and also strike out, in lines 5 and 6, the words "and each and every day during which such violation continues shall constitute a separate and distinct offense."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken; and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the committee amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 16, after the word "aforesaid," insert "or in event of default on the part of such physician."

On page 2, line 18, after the word "person," insert "or in event of default on the part of the physician aforesaid."

On page 2, line 21, after the word "aforesaid," insert "or in event of default on the part of the physician aforesaid."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like an explanation of what this bill is.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. In the reading of the bill by the Clerk I was impressed with the notion that it might possibly operate very injuriously to parents under some circumstances. I confess that in the enforcement of laws and regulations for the prevention of spread of contagious and infectious diseases rigid provision must be established. But in this case the law requires the person in charge of a patient to make a pen-written certificate containing certain items of information. Now, there is not one parent, perhaps, in forty in the District of Columbia, or anywhere else, that would be prepared on the spur of the moment to write out a certificate of that kind. It might not occur to them. The second section of the bill defines the term "the person in charge of any patient" as used in the first section, and it is first defined to be the physician in charge; second, in the absence or the disability of the physician, then the parents—the head of the family. If the physician should be absent, the parent must make this certificate without delay, and each day's delay would constitute a separate offense, and the penalty is fine and imprisonment. I can conceive a good many circumstances under which a parent innocently might be subject to the penalty. Suppose a physician in attendance on a patient afflicted with one of the diseases mentioned in the first section of the bill should be acquainted with the character of the disease and should absent himself. What does that mean? Absent himself from the house, from the premises, from the city, or from the District? Suppose he should absent himself from the home. The head of the family has the right to presume, of course, that the physician will perform his duty under the law; but suppose he neglects to do it. Suppose he does not do it, and it is said that he absented himself. I do not understand what responsibility would be located upon the head of the family where the physician absents himself. I would like to know what absence means. Does it mean absence from the city in the absence or disability of any physician?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is in the absence of calling a physician to the premises.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The absence of calling a physician?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the construction the committee put upon that when they were considering the bill. I will say the amendments I sent to the Clerk's desk a moment ago I think remedy very largely the objections that have been raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I probably misinterpreted the bill as it was being read.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will state for the information of the House that the purpose of this bill is to extend the provisions of laws that now exist so as to cover other communicable diseases than those named in the laws passed in 1890 and 1902.

The laws passed in those years only covered diphtheria, scarlet fever, and typhoid fever, a law having been passed years before covering the case of smallpox. In addition to these, the law is to cover all communicable diseases in one law, and provides for proper regulation and protection of the public against the spread of such diseases.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, then, the bill, as you have explained it, means that the head of the family shall make the certificate defined in section 1. Now, where no physician has been called, or the physician that has been called is disabled, the head of the family must know, of course, that the patient is afflicted with one of those diseases before the penalty can be imposed upon him. Is that right?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think that would be the proper construction of the law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It should be the necessary construction.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say it will be the necessary construction, because I have known of a case of smallpox being attended to five days by physicians this winter before they knew what it was and could report.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is all right in relation to a physician and head of the family, but you impose a penalty for failure to report if they know the existence of the disease.

Mr. BABCOCK. The penalty can not lie unless they do know.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That would be a defense against the penalty provisions of the act. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills, and had directed him to report the same, some with amendments and some without amendments, with the recommendation that the House do pass those without amendment, and agree to the amendments as to the others, and pass the bills as amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 4464) to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit this bill to the committee, with instructions to amend by striking out all after the word "dollars" in line 22, then strike out all the remainder of lines 23, 24, and 25, and lines 1 and 2, on page 5, to and including the word "dollars."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to recommit with instructions, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think that motion is in order.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not been ordered. If the previous question had been ordered, the motion would not be in order until after the engrossment and third reading of the bill; but, as the previous question has not been ordered, the bill is open to full consideration, and this is one method of consideration, to move to recommit. The Clerk will report the motion.

Page 4, line 22, after the word "dollars," strike out the remainder of the line, all of lines 23, 24, and 25, and lines 1 and 2 on page 5 to and including the word "dollars."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, when the Committee on Appropriations had under consideration the question of appropriating for the fire department of the District of Columbia, the Commissioners recommended an appropriation for one clerk in the fire department, at $1,200. This bill seeks to create an additional position of chief clerk, at $1,400 a year.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, did not the gentleman know at that time that the Commissioners were asking for a superintendent, at $4,000 a year?

Mr. MADDEN. No, sir; the gentleman did not know anything about it; and the Commissioners assured the Committee on Appropriations that one clerk at $1,200 was all that would be needed to properly perform the duties of the office.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, as coming from the District Commissioners, is absolutely true; and if the provisions for superintendent of fire department in this bill had not been stricken out, the provision for chief clerk would not be in the bill. If we here provided for a general superintendent of the fire department at $4,000 a year, with a clerk at $1,500 a year, there would have been no necessity for the clerk that has been provided for in this bill. The Commissioners fully intended that there should be a superintendent with these clerks; and it is for that reason that they only asked $1,200 for one clerk for the engineer. We eliminated from the bill the provision for superintendent that was pending before the committee when the Commissioners appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and made the statement referred to. I say we eliminated the provision creating a superintendent of the fire department, and provided instead for a chief clerk, and in that way have saved the District $2,600 a year upon that one item. I sincerely hope the motion of the gentleman from Illinois will be voted down.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us have a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 35, noes 76.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is filibustering.

The SPEAKER. Well, up to this time it does not appear patent to the Chair. This is not a filibustering motion, anyway. There must be a quorum first.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, how does a man have to look when he is filibustering? What are the physical symptoms?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no warrant issued.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is not time yet, Mr. Speaker. It is not 6 o'clock.

The SPEAKER (having counted the House). One hundred and ninety Members present; not a quorum. The doors will be closed; the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in the absentees.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recommit the bill. Those in favor of the motion will vote "yea," those opposed to the motion will vote "nay," those present and not voting will answer "present;" and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 50, nays 144, answered "present" 21, not voting 165, as follows:

EXTENSION OF KALORAMA ROAD.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 130) authorizing the extension of Kalorama road NW., as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to offer the following amendment as a substitute, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That, under and in accordance with the provisions of sections 491a and 491n, both inclusive, of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within thirty days after the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Kalorama road from Eighteenth street to Champlain street, with a width of 50 feet.

"SEC. 2. That the sum of $300, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessment for benefits when the same are collected, and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of all judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman if this is a further extension of this Kalorama avenue?

Mr. BABCOCK. No; that was the bill that was considered some three months ago in Committee of the Whole and reported favorably to the House. Since then Congress has passed a bill providing for all cases of street opening, which it does now under the statute, and all that Congress has to do is simply to direct the Commissioners to proceed under the law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentlemen will remember that the Kalorama avenue extension bill seemed to be a specialty and was considered here for some time; we discussed it for quite a while. As I remember it, we passed that bill. I objected to it and suggested certain changes that should be made to it.

Mr. BABCOCK. It passed the Committee of the Whole, but it has been on the Calendar as unfinished business, and was left there on account of legislation pending before Congress making a permanent provision for the opening of streets.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have passed a general bill since.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is a fact, also, on account of the objection made to a special law at that time that this general bill was introduced and passed as the fruit of that discussion?

Mr. BABCOCK. That is correct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

AMENDING THE DISTRICT CODE RELATING TO INTEREST AND USURY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the bill H. R. 14806.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14806) to amend the Code of Law for the District of Columbia relating to interest and usury.

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 34 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, enacted March 3, 1901, as well as all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof in so far as the same may be inconsistent herewith, be amended by striking out section 1180 of said chapter 34 and inserting in said chapter 34 the following:

"SEC. 1180. WHAT IS USURY?—If any person or corporation shall contract in the District verbally to pay a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent per annum, or shall contract in writing to pay a greater rate than 10 per cent per annum, the creditor shall forfeit the whole interest so contracted to be received: Provided, That nothing in this chapter contained shall be held to repeal or affect the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, relating to pawnbrokers."

"SEC. 1180a. PUNISHMENT OF USURY.—Every person, firm, association, joint stock company or corporation, and every officer, or agent of such firm, association, joint stock company or corporation who, jointly or severally, directly, or indirectly, receives, or causes to be received, any interest, discount, or consideration upon a loan or forbearance of any money, goods, or things in action, whether with or without the pledge or security of negotiable or nonnegotiable paper, bond, bill, or instrument in writing, chattels, expectant or contingent estates, legacies, annuities, or any interest in or concerning real, personal, or mixed property, or in any other way, in whatever form such interest, discount, or consideration may be concealed, and whether such interest, discount, or consideration may be charged by way of commissions, attorneys' fees, brokerage charges, expenses of the loan, and the like, or in any other way, at a rate greater than is provided for in the foregoing section, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished, upon conviction, by a fine of not more than $200 or by imprisonment for not more than six months."

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know something about this bill. I got the impression, during the course of its reading, that if a party agrees verbally, orally, to pay a rate of interest in excess of 6 per cent that that would be usury and he would forfeit all interest. What was that provision about the verbal promise?

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I say to the gentleman I think he has confounded provisions of the bill as originally introduced with the provisions of the bill as reported from the committee. The bill as now reported by the committee merely provides that it shall be usury. Let me read the bill:

If any person or corporation shall contract in the District verbally to pay a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent per annum, or shall contract in writing to pay a greater rate than 10 per cent per annum, the creditor shall forfeit the whole interest so contracted to be received.

That is the only penalty for usury in the bill as reported from the committee.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is the only penalty in the bill?

Mr. OLCOTT. That is the only penalty reported by the committee.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not at all like the policy of providing for usury for what you term "verbal agreements" to pay, because they are so subject to misunderstanding and controversy. There ought to be no usury or an excessive interest unless the contract is in writing, and there ought not to be any rate of interest except one fixed by law unless the contract be put in writing fixing it at another rate. I do not like that plan at all of providing for usury in a verbal agreement. You can see how it will give rise to all kinds of controversies and misunderstandings in relation to questions of fact.

Mr. OLCOTT. Of course I appreciate that is a matter of opinion. As a matter of fact, this section 1180 has been rather inconsistent with other sections of the Code, Nos. 1178 and 1179. It seemed to the committee, after considering the matter, I think, with a considerable amount of care, that this provision was safe in view of the fact that we made the only penalty for usury the forfeiture of the excessive interest agreed to be paid.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, the gentleman can readily see how it will give rise to all kinds of controversies and contests in the courts. There will be the testimony of one witness, one party against the other, and it will be a fruitful source of litigation. I do not like the policy, and I arose to make the inquiry because I thought there was some penal provision in connection with the subject of usury.

Mr. OLCOTT. In the bill as originally introduced there were penal provisions contained. The committee were almost unanimously opposed to that. I will say in this connection that we had considerable discussion, and I think that in the discussion I rather took the position that the gentleman is now taking. I think, however, that this can do no serious harm, because the sole punishment is the forfeiture of the interest. Where more than 10 per cent is reserved in a written contract this proposed law applies, so that the matter of proof is simple.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why did you fix the maximum amount in the written contract at 10 per cent?

Mr. OLCOTT. In order to make the provision in section 1180 consistent with the provisions of other sections of the code relating to the same matter.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The contract rate fixed by the law in the District is 10 per cent.

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And that is the highest rate I know of in the eastern part of the country.

Mr. OLCOTT. Section 1179 of the code, under the title "Express contracts," reads:

The parties to a bond, bill, promissory note, or other instrument of writing for the payment of money at any future time may contract therein for the payment of interest on the principal amount thereof at any rate not exceeding 10 per cent per annum.

And as we did not wish to change the organic law, so to speak, of the District, we thought this was proper.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the maximum rate might have been made 8, but I will not make any objection.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would like to ask why you distinguish between a rate in an oral contract and a written one. You limit it to 6 per cent in an oral contract and 10 per cent in a written contract. Why that distinction?

Mr. OLCOTT. I would say in regard to that that we considered it was probable that if a person is willing to pay 10 per cent and contract for such payment in writing, he probably had more time to take into consideration the amount of interest he was willing to pay for the use of money. That was all.

Mr. McCARTHY. The legal rate as now fixed by law in this District is 10 per cent?

Mr. OLCOTT. Oh, no. The legal rate is 6 per cent, but you can contract in writing for an amount up to 10 per cent, and if no interest whatever is mentioned obligations bear 6 per cent.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SALARIES OF TEACHERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18442) entitled "An act to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia," with sundry Senate amendments.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] moves that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is any amendment to this bill creating a new office or increase of salaries, or making an appropriation from the Treasury?

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand there is one creating a new office, which the House committee would not concur in.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. MORRELL, Mr. GREENE, and Mr. McLAIN.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the several bills on the District Calendar were passed, and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WEBBER, for one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. EDWARDS, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in family.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, with Mr. WATSON in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] a question. On the last legislative day the items with reference to fuel tests were passed over.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I have been requested by Members to ask unanimous consent that all items included in the request that we passed on Saturday last, namely, the items in relation to the registers and receivers of the Land Office and items in relation to the Geological Survey, be passed over without prejudice until to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman expect to take them up when we go into Committee of the Whole, if we go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow morning?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the items heretofore passed over be again passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if it is agreeable to the committee, I will ask that these items be passed over until all the other items have been considered in the bill except the Panama Canal appropriation; that these precede that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not like to interfere with the gentleman from Minnesota on his own bill, but I would scarcely agree to that, for this reason: As a rule, when we finish a bill here it is late in the afternoon, and the question passed over I think is an important one. I think we ought to pass upon it. We have ample time for the House to consider and pass that question and give it consideration which it will never receive if it has to wait until we wind up the bill, which will probably be at a late hour, and the House will be hurrying to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that we will not have wound up the bill until we have passed on the Panama Canal proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know; but, seriously, I must object to their going over to the end of the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Personally I have no interest in the matter at all. I would as soon take up the matter and dispose of it in the morning as at any other time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman to adhere to his original request.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first request of the gentleman from Minnesota. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting a new paragraph.

Insert a new paragraph at line 12, page 109, as follows:

"For continuing improvement of Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio River and the mouth of the Missouri River, $500,000."

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I make the point of order upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order or reserve it?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will reserve it for the present.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the present sundry civil appropriation bill carries appropriations altogether amounting to $2,550,000 for improvement of the Mississippi River south of the mouth of the Ohio River. There are also appropriations amounting to $480,000 for improvements in the Mississippi River north of the mouth of the Missouri, but over that stretch of the river included between the mouth of the Ohio River and the mouth of the Missouri River there is no money appropriated at all, and consequently there can be no improvement in that stretch of the river during the coming year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few months ago I was invited to attend a meeting of the officers of the Merchants' Exchange in the city of St. Louis, at which the committee on improving the Mississippi River of the Merchants' Exchange were present, and where were also invited a number of captains operating boats on the river between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri. The purpose of that meeting was to ask the opinion of these river captains as to what improvements would be necessary for that stretch of the river for the coming year, with the idea of asking Congress to appropriate the sum requisite. Mr. Chairman, it was the unanimous opinion of all those captains operating boats on that river that in the neighborhood of a million dollars should be appropriated for improvements of the Mississippi on that stretch between the mouth of the Ohio River and the mouth of the Missouri River for the coming year. I was requested to do what I could to get that appropriation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that stretch of the river is certainly in need of improvement. We have a great deal of commerce there; a number of cities are included in that stretch, among others the cities of St. Louis and East St. Louis. All the coal products that come from Pittsburg down the Ohio River must go up that stretch on its way to the city of St. Louis.

We find, Mr. Chairman, this position—that they are improving the river below the mouth of the Ohio and north of the Missouri, but leaving a stretch in between unimproved. Now, it does not strike me that it is ordinary business to do that. Why improve above and below and leave a stretch in between not properly improved? If you have this improvement above and below, boats can not pass properly between. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, this is true: By improving the river below and above, but leaving the portion in between unimproved, the natural flow of the river will destroy the work that is done below. It is poor business policy to improve the Mississippi River by piecemeal. This thing of pottering here and pottering there, now digging a hole along one stretch and then another, but leaving a place in between the improved portions not improved is the poorest sort of policy. The pursuance of this policy of improvement is one reason why the river is difficult to navigate. There should be, Mr. Chairman, some general plan; there should be some definite plan for the improvement of the whole river under one general system from its headwaters to the Gulf.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that I may continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman will print the remainder of his remarks in the RECORD. I should like very much to proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. I think this is an important matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has asked unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we at St. Louis and all along the river are anxious that the river improvement should be carried on under some general system. As we have at present two or three commissions at different points on the river, a single general plan is not carried out, and the work is certainly not effective. I want to say that all up and down the river there is a universal sentiment that proper attention is not being given by Congress to the river. We do not appropriate enough money. We are told that it does not do any good. Why, Mr. Chairman, we do not appropriate enough to find out. If we would spend an amount of money on the Mississippi River equal to the cost of building a railroad along its banks, the river would be navigable clear up toward the headwaters. We appropriate large sums of money for the arts of war, I believe some 40 per cent of all of our revenues, but only 3 or 4 per cent for all the arts of peace. And, Mr. Chairman, if we would devote more attention to the improvement of our internal facilities, we would be taking long strides toward the advancement of our national prosperity.

Every year the railroads of the country spend nearly a billion of dollars on the improvement and extension of their lines, while but comparatively few millions are spent for river improvements. There is a hundred times as much money spent in improving the railroads of our country as there is in improving our river systems; a hundred times, I say; but if the rivers were properly improved, if we would devote only, say, one-tenth as much to river improvements as is devoted to the extension and improvement of the railroad lines, we would certainly have an adequate and complete railroad rate regulator by reason of our improved river systems.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to this committee to pass this appropriation for that stretch of the river. We ask that this $500,000 may be appropriated for the stretch of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri. Surely there can be no cause for which this committee can appropriate money that will result in so much good to the people of the Mississippi Valley. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, I think there should be a word of criticism upon the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD]. I do not like to listen here to complaints from localities which have been the most generously treated of any in the country.

In the first place, the gentleman from Missouri is entirely in error in saying that there is no money on hand for this improvement. On the 1st of May last the amount to the credit of this improvement was approximately $660,000, and I think the gentleman's time would be better spent, and that of others who are seeking for appropriations, if they would develop a little commerce upon that stretch of the river. For the last two or three years they have had a depth of water nearly as great as that which is to be obtained by the improvement which they advocate. This was true for at least two years, and I am informed during most of three years, yet the movement of boats has been very small. The total traffic on this stretch of the river has only amounted to about 540,000 tons, or one-twentieth the amount upon the Monongahela River above Pittsburg. Yet there is a project which is agitated there under which we would spend $20,000,000 right in the face of this unfavorable showing. Also it is urged that we should maintain this part of the channel at a cost of $400,000 a year. It would certainly be cheaper to take all the freight which is offered and transport it to any place in the country where the shipper desires it to be sent without cost to him.

What they ought to do is to show, by the development of traffic, by the employment of the boats which are now in existence, that when the depth exists for which they are clamoring, and has existed for several years, they can make some use of it. Then they might come to Congress with some show of justice. But until then there is certainly an answer to all claims when we point to the eleven or twelve million dollars expended upon the Mississippi, between the Ohio and the Missouri, and the meager and poverty-stricken results which have come from that very large expenditure.

I insist on the point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss the point of order. I may not be properly informed, but I do not understand that there are $600,000 available for next year.

My understanding is there are $600,000, all told, appropriated by previous bills or authorized by previous bills, but which can be appropriated from year to year. I understand there is only $15,000 which may be used for the coming year.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. In response to the request of the gentleman's colleague I sent word to the War Department two days ago, and the report was that $660,000 was on hand May 1 last.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Available for next year?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes; on hand in the Treasury.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Yes; that amount has been authorized, but is it available?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I can not make that any clearer than I have made it. There is this amount of cash in the Treasury of the United States to be drawn against for this improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call attention of the gentlemen to the fact that they are not discussing the point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. We have authorized by previous bills certain amounts of money, and consequently this bill can carry appropriations which have previously been authorized, the same as all the other items carried in this bill for river improvement. Now, I say that there have been bills passed authorizing the money, and it can now be appropriated. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether there is any authorization in law?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. There is no authorization, Mr. Chairman. As stated in the discussion of the bill on Saturday, no authorization was made for this portion of the river beyond that appropriated by the sundry civil act of March 3, 1905.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Has that amount been exhausted?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. By no means. There is almost, if not quite, as much on hand as the amount appropriated March 3, 1905.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. I don't know why they do not spend the money.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Headstones for graves of soldiers: For continuing the work of furnishing headstones for unmarked graves of Union soldiers, sailors, and marines in national, post, city, town, and village cemeteries, naval cemeteries at navy-yards and stations of the United States, and other burial places, under the acts of March 3, 1873, and February 3, 1879, $49,538.25.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 12, page 110, the following paragraph:

"For completing the marking of places where American soldiers fell and were temporarily interred in Cuba and China, $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, such sum to be immediately available."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. My recollection is that that work has been completed under previous appropriations.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the point of order being reserved. I may say that the committee did not have this matter properly before it; neither the subcommittee nor the full committee. My attention was called to it after the bill was reported here. When the committee was considering this matter it was supposed that the former appropriation would be entirely sufficient, but I now hold in my hand a letter which I think I had better read, which explains the omission, for I have no doubt that the committee would be entirely willing to finish this work.

In the sundry civil bill of last year there was contained this appropriation:

For marking the places where American soldiers fell and were temporarily interred in Cuba and China, $9,500, said sum to be immediately available.

That was supposed to be sufficient; but a letter I have, dated May 31, 1906, from the Quartermaster-General, reads as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, May 31, 1906.

Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER,
House of Representatives, Washington.

SIR: The secretary of the Santiago and China Battlefields Commission, Col. Webb C. Hayes, has requested me to write to you regarding the desirability of an appropriation of $4,000 for completing the work of marking the places where American soldiers fell and were temporarily interred in Cuba and China.

The amount of money appropriated last year for this purpose (sundry civil act approved March 3, 1905), $9,500, did not prove to be sufficient, as it was found when the work was taken up that the labor and material in Cuba were very much more expensive than had been quoted when the estimate for the work was made. The result is that it has recently developed that the amount appropriated last year has been inadequate to complete the work.

This fact was not discovered, however, in time to include this estimate in the regular estimates submitted by this Department, and unless the appropriation of $4,000 is made it will leave the work in an incomplete condition until the next session of Congress, which is not thought to be desirable, as it is understood that the Cuban Government is making plans for and expects to expend some $180,000 in constructing a boulevard along the trenches and about the battlefields, as well as placing a monument at the surrender tree. In view of this fact, I personally consider that it is very desirable and proper that this Government should expend the small sum of money which is necessary for locating and marking the places where the battle was fought and the men fell in action.

Respectfully,
C. F. HUMPHREY,
Quartermaster-General United States Army.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is that letter from the Quartermaster-General?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is this work done under the direction of a commission?

Mr. KEIFER. Under the jurisdiction of a commission, sometimes called a committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is an association created how?

Mr. KEIFER. I can not say how it was created.

Mr. TAWNEY. It has no legal status?

Mr. KEIFER. No; except it is proper to say that they pay their own expenses and carry out the policy of the Government in marking these places. There is nothing paid by the United States for traveling expenses or anything of that kind, as I find from an examination of the report made by the Secretary of War to the Senate. So that the money that is appropriated to complete the work is used directly for marking the graves of the soldiers who fell in Cuba and in China.

I think that is sufficient explanation. It might be said, Mr. Chairman, that this is a work that is commenced and not completed. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order and allow the amendment to be adopted.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this is not a work in progress. The last sundry civil appropriation bill provided as follows:

For marking the places where American soldiers fell and were temporarily interred in Cuba and China, $9,500, said sum to be immediately available.

Of course that means that the work was to be completed with the money that was appropriated by the last Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. I intend to make the point of order, but I want to say in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] that neither the subcommittee nor the full committee considered this mtter fully——

Mr. KEIFER. I did not say that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Or had not sufficient information, or some such statement of that kind, that when the Quartermaster-General, General Humphrey, whose letter the gentleman has just read, was before the committee, the chairman of the subcommittee asked him this question:

The language in the next item is for marking the places where American soldiers fell and were temporarily interred in Cuba and China.

General HUMPHREY. None has been made. The work is carried out by an association. Nine thousand dollars was allowed for the purpose last year.

Mr. Chairman, there is no country in the world that provides as we do, or that has provided as we have, in respect to the soldiers. First, we provide for bringing home their remains. Then we have appropriated $9,000 to be used by an association organized for the purpose of marking the places in China and Cuba where this particular man and that particular man fell or was temporarily interred. What is the necessity for work of that kind? We bring their remains home; we bury them here, and mark the places where they are buried with appropriate inscriptions as to their service and the place or the country or the battle in which they fell, and it seems to me entirely useless to undertake marking places where these men have fallen in battle in foreign countries. We have absolutely no control over the preservation of these marks unless we go and purchase the property on which the marks are placed, and inasmuch as $9,000 has already been appropriated and no estimate was submitted by the Department, and when the Quartermaster-General was before the committee he made no statement as to the necessity for an appropriation, the committee felt that it was justified in omitting this item, as the Department had recommended in submitting their annual estimates. I shall, therefore, Mr. Chairman, insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes. I supposed that the point of order would hardly be urged against an appropriation that was simply to carry out a policy that has been very largely executed now. It would be very unfair to the graves of those that were not marked to stop now. Having spent $9,500 in this work, we are hardly called upon to discuss the question as to the propriety of entering upon it. What is desired is simply to conclude the object which was settled and determined in the sundry civil act of 1905, plainly stating that it was to mark the graves of these people who fell in Cuba or in China. It did not accomplish the end, because the appropriation was insufficient. It is very true, Mr. Chairman, that the committee is under no possibility of criticism for omitting this item, because, according to the statement of the Quartermaster-General—and he made his first statement in the light of the information he then had before him—he made no estimate then, and the committee was not called on to consider the question of adding anything to complete this work. On the contrary, the committee properly left it out of the whole bill, but now, in this letter of May 31, the Quartermaster-General states that his attention being called to it, on examination he finds that it will take $4,000 to continue and complete the object entered upon under the provision of the act of 1905. I appeal to the gentleman and I appeal to the Chair to look well to this. We have entered upon the policy and we have now the estimate of the Quartermaster-General that to conclude the work it will take $4,000 more, and, if I may be permitted to say a word more, I will add that when I was asked what sort of a committee was giving this work attention I was unable to state. I desire to state now that from memoranda in Senate Document 157 this is stated:

On February 2, 1905, Maj. Gen. John C. Bates, United States Army, president of the Society of the Army of Santiago de Cuba, appointed a committee, composed of Lieut. Gen. S. B. M. Young, United States Army, retired; Col. A. L. Wagner, United States Army, and Lieut. Col. W. B. Hayes, United States Volunteers, to arrange for marking such points of interest in the vicinity of Santiago de Cuba as the committee might deem historically important.

Then, in the same document in the report of the Secretary of War, it is stated that the committee was charged "with the duty of carrying out the provisions of the enactment above cited," with the proviso that "no mileage or traveling expenses, or any other personal expenses incurred by the members of the committees, will be charged to this appropriation or any other Government appropriation." He states, further, that the members of this committee have paid their necessary traveling expenses themselves and have discharged their duty in Cuba.

So we are now getting the work done by these distinguished officers of the Army at their own expense. We have entered upon it. They have doubtless faithfully carried out the purpose of the original appropriation, as far as the appropriation would allow them, and to stop here would be very improper, in my opinion. I think this comes fairly within the clause of Rule XXI as to carrying out an object already entered upon. Perhaps some of these markers have already been ordered or been prepared. They made preparations to finish their work and mark these soldiers' graves in Cuba and in China, and I submit that the point of order is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether or not there is any authorization in law for the marking of these particular graves?

Mr. KEIFER. I presume there is no authorization, but the Secretary of War is authorized to mark the graves, under the appropriation of 1905. It comes within the general authorization to him, and he adopted the plan of doing it in the cheapest way, so as to protect the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. When was that appropriation bill passed with that language in it?

Mr. KEIFER. You will find the language given in the act of 1905, I think I have it here, the language that makes the appropriation leaves it to be carried out under the general head of "National Cemeteries," and all of that, as I understand, is entirely work that is carried out under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask whether or not the appropriation was made for marking these particular graves mentioned in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. KEIFER. My amendment to this bill is to make the further necessary appropriation. The provision for the marking of these graves is in the act of 1905, which applies to the current year, and that provision has already been read: "For marking the places where American soldiers fell and were temporarily interred in Cuba and in China, $9,500; said sum to be immediately available." That was under the Secretary of War necessarily, and this would be the same way. The work that he entered upon was simply the adoption of the cheapest way of doing it through this distinguished committee of the Society of Santiago de Cuba, and the committee at its own expense served faithfully without any expense to the Government and placed the markers so far as the appropriation went, and no part of the money that was appropriated was expended for paying traveling expenses or anything of that kind. This proposed amendment is simply to complete the object which originated in the act of 1905.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds in the appropriation bill passed in 1905 an appropriation "For marking places where American soldiers fell and were temporarily interred in Cuba and China." It seems to be a definite object appropriated for in the last bill and capable of being carried into execution and completion. The Chair thinks it is not subject to the point of order, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I care to add anything further to the discussion which has taken place. The committee is doubtless quite well informed of the object. The Government of Cuba has taken great pains to make a park in Santiago. In the building of which it is stated somewhere they have expended or are about to spend $180,000, and of course it follows that the placing of these markers upon that sacred ground, although the Government of the United States does not own it, will be carefully cared for by the Republic of Cuba.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, as I stated a moment ago, the committee had no estimate for this appropriation, and when before the committee the Quartermaster-General in effect said that no estimate was made for the reason that the current appropriation of $9,500 had practically completed the work.

Now, this appropriation grew out of a sentiment created by this society or association referred to by the gentleman from Ohio. As I said a moment ago there is no government that has provided more liberally for preserving memories concerning the services and death of American soldiers in battle than our Government has. At the time of the war with Mexico we did not have the policy of bringing home for interment here upon American soil the soldiers who were killed in battle in a foreign land, and therefore we have to-day a national cemetery near the City of Mexico in which American soldiers who fell in the battles in that war are interred, and a superintendent is provided for to look after that cemetery. But this proposition is not to mark the places where the soldier is interred. The object is to mark the places where the soldier fell in battle or where he was temporarily buried before his remains were brought back to the United States. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, like a foolish waste of money for the reason that we have absolutely no control over these proposed markings. We do not own the land upon which the mark is placed, and it may be destroyed the day after it is put up and necessitate re-marking or else necessitate the appointment of a governmental official to reside in foreign lands for the purpose of preserving these markings which we now establish and renew them as they may be destroyed or as they may rot and decay.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is an entirely unnecessary appropriation, and in view of the fact that the Department did not consider it of sufficient importance to make an estimate for it, I fail to see any justification for the committee voting the amendment into the bill.

Mr. STERLING. How many men were there?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am unable to state the number that were killed in battle in the Cuban and Chinese wars, but the number was comparatively small.

Mr. STERLING. Perhaps the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] can tell.

Mr. KEIFER. I can not give you the number from anything I have before me.

Mr. TAWNEY. The number was certainly comparatively small, and this work, as I understand from the Department, is practically completed now. This association undertook the work voluntarily. It did not undertake it at the instance nor upon any authority of Congress, but after they had undertaken the work they came here and secured an appropriation on the representation that $9,500 would be all that was needed. Now they ask for $4,000 more, and they do not say, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] can not tell us, for what purposes that money is to be expended. He says possibly—or "perhaps" is the word he used—this may be for the purchase of markers. For us to appropriate money blindly in this manner is certainly not good legislation nor good policy, and I trust the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] if it would not involve us in this, that we would be obliged to purchase land in foreign countries where soldiers fell, and in the event of future wars we would be pledged to that policy and we would be buying land all over the world? We would be obliged to do it in order to protect these markers we erect, would we not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Unquestionably if the country in which the markings are located refuse to give us that permission, or if the owner of the land refuses, the only way the place where a man has fallen in battle would be marked would be by buying so much land.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And then the next proposition would be to erect monuments upon this land that we have purchased, and in the next Congress they would come in and ask us to establish guards to superintend these monuments and protect them, and so on, and we would never see the end of such a policy.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say further, Mr. Chairman, this policy has never prevailed in respect to any war or in respect to the soldiers who have fallen in battle in any wars of this country, foreign or domestic. Take it in the civil war, the place where men have fallen, except in rare instances like that of a commanding general, have not been marked. The place where their remains have been deposited has been marked. A provision is carried in this bill for such marking, but it has never been the policy in respect to the civil war or in respect to wars engaged in in foreign lands to adopt a policy of this kind, and I think it an unnecessary policy to inaugurate now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is possibly a little bit incorrect in stating his history. I think we have a reservation in Mexico.

Mr. TAWNEY. I stated a moment ago that we have a national cemetery in Mexico.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not hear the gentleman state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. But that marks the graves where the men are buried and where their remains are now lying. It does not mark the place where they fell in battle.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course not.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to prolong this discussion, but I want to answer one or two things. It is very easy to suggest a possibility of what we may be asked to do in the future, and therefore build up something like a great bugbear here and stop an important work that the Government has already entered upon and determined a policy about, and this after it is partly finished away off in foreign countries, I do not, Mr. Chairman, criticise the committee because it did not put the item in this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. There was no estimate.

Mr. KEIFER. There was no estimate, the chairman rightly states, but there is now a statement from the Quartermaster-General which shows that it is necessary to have, in order to complete the work, $4,000 more. I have carefully drawn the amendment so as to provide that only such part of that sum shall be used as is found necessary.

It is not fair to say that this sum may be used for some purpose not stated in the amendment. Gentlemen upon the committee say they do not know what use the money is going to be applied to. It is expressly stated in this amendment, in the language of the clause of the act of 1905, that it is to be used for markers to mark the graves of the soldiers who fell in Cuba and in China. Now, then, when they say that some voluntary organization is responsible for this, that is not fair, because the War Department but for that voluntary organization would have at the Government expense to send its own officers or employees of the Quartermaster-General off to these foreign countries to make the necessary preparation and to put up the markers; but General Young and Colonel Hayes and others volunteered, as representing the Society of Santiago, and undertook to do this work for nothing, and thus save the Government all that expense. These officers, or the society, paid all expenses in going to Cuba, and in no other way was the Government called upon to do this work under the former appropriation.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is your proposition to mark the places where the soldiers are now buried in Cuba and China or the places where they were temporarily buried?

Mr. KEIFER. It is to mark the places where they were temporarily buried. I presume that is so, for that is the language of the act of 1905 and the language of my amendment. It is not fair to say we never have entered upon this policy. We have had a general policy that has been carried out in detail in the United States. I have recently been on the Antietam battlefield, and to say nothing of the cemetery where the dead soldiers are buried and their graves marked with appropriate individual headstones, places all over that field where the troops fought, Union and Confederate, all along the many roads there are tablets or signs with suitable inscriptions on which you can read the history of the battle as you ride along.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KEIFER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Burial of indigent soldiers: For expenses of burying in the Arlington National Cemetery, or in the cemeteries of the District of Columbia, indigent ex-Union soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late civil war and soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain who die in the District of Columbia, or in the immediate vicinity thereof, and of such soldiers, sailors, and marines who die in the District of Columbia and are buried in the immediate vicinity thereof, to be disbursed by the Secretary of War, at a cost not exceeding $45 for such burial expenses in each case, exclusive of cost of grave, $3,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 111, line 3, after the word "thereof" insert the words "or in the Government Hospital for the Insane."

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment, because it has appeared that the old soldiers who died in the Government Hospital for the Insane did not have the privilege which is accorded to the soldiers who died in the other institutions here; and it seems to me that these old soldiers there ought to have the same privileges and ought to be provided for in the same way as the indigent soldiers, sailors, and marines are provided for in the various other places.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman's amendment apply only to the indigent, the same as in the other part of the paragraph?

Mr. HAY. It only applies to the indigent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 19264) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education in the District of Columbia, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BURKETT, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. GEARIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of sperintendent of Antietam battlefield, said superintendent to perform his duties under the direction of the Quartermaster's Department and to be selected and appointed by the Secretary of War, at his discretion, the person selected and appointed to this position to be an honorably discharged Union soldier, $1,500.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer for adoption the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 19, page 111, the following paragraph:

"For the purpose of constructing a macadamized road from the town of Sharpsburg, Washington County, Md., over a portion of the battlefield of Antietam to and over the Burnside Bridge to the Connecticut monument on said battlefield, upon, along, or near the line of an existing county road between said points: Provided, however, That the county commissioners or other proper authority of said county or State shall first convey and confirm, without cost, a right of way in perpetuity over said existing road or other line that may be selected to the United States a good and sufficient title to the same, approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, the sum of $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, which shall be spent under the direction and supervision of the Quartermaster-General of the United States and in conformity to the general plan for the improvement of the battlefield of Antietam."

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve the point of order for the purpose of hearing the explanation of the gentleman.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I make the point of order and press it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order. Has the gentleman from Ohio anything to say on that question?

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order for a moment.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I insist upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts insists upon the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment covers the matter of the construction of a macadamized road from the center of the battlefield called "Sharpsburg" in southern literature, but called "Antietam" in northern literature. We have at Antietam a great many macadamized roads over the field. Almost all the northern part of the field and generally the whole of that memorable battlefield is now covered with macadamized roads, and there have been built a good many monuments, some Confederate as well as Union. There are many such roads leading over that field, with markers indicating the part of the field over which particular organizations of either army fought. We have about completed the work of building these macadamized roads. This one was omitted and has not been constructed. The one mentioned in my amendment is almost the only important one not so improved. I have recently been there, as have some other Members of the House and committee. This road leads from Sharpsburg, which was the headquarters of General Lee, in the most direct way to what is now known as "Burnside Bridge," then known as the "Stone Bridge," over Antietam Creek. This bridge was on the left of the Union battle line and on the Confederate right. It is where there was some of the severest fighting.

Passing over that bridge, the road is to go to the monument that was erected by the State of Connecticut, near which is also a monument erected to our late martyred President, William McKinley. A policy was entered upon long ago of macadamizing these roads over the entire battlefield. There is no partiality about it, nothing to favor the Union any more than Confederate troops. The building of this road is a part of a general purpose of improving and caring for the whole battlefield. I am not now talking about the Antietam cemetery, also there, where there are graves of both Union and Confederate soldiers. I think the amendment is in order, as carrying out——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is this road all on Government land?

Mr. KEIFER. This road is not now all on Government land, but by the reading of the amendment you will discover that before it is built, the county of Washington, State of Maryland, is to convey a good title to the Government.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Then this amendment occupies the dual position of authorization and appropriation.

Mr. KEIFER. It does not allow the Secretary of War to build the road until the United States has a good title.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. That is authorization.

Mr. KEIFER. This is the best time to have that done.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask if this is now the public highway which leads from Sharpsburg to the Burnside Bridge?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I think it is, but——

Mr. HEPBURN. And heretofore has been maintained by the public as one of their common highways.

Mr. KEIFER. It has been a common road, but we find by the provisions of the proposed amendment that the Secretary of War is to build it on or near the line of the road, but in any case only after he gets a full title to the Government in the road.

Mr. HEPBURN. The purpose of this amendment, then, is to relieve the municipality from a further charge for maintaining one of their public highways.

Mr. KEIFER. I will be very candid with the gentleman, and state that some gentlemen up there told me who were very much opposed to its being built on the public highway, not because they were opposed to the road, but because the public could drive over it and cut it up and destroy it; and having that information, I put in the amendment a provision that the Secretary of War might acquire land that did not belong to the general public, leaving the present road for general travel. But in the main that is the more direct line of road from Sharpsburg to the bridge. This amendment is necessary to carry out the policy that the Government has already entered upon of covering the entire field with macadamized roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman whether this proposed road, or any part of it, runs on or over land not now owned by the Government?

Mr. KEIFER. It undoubtedly does run over land not now belonging to the Government, and because of that it is provided in the amendment that the Government, before building the macadamized road, shall be vested with a perfect title. There are already a large number of beautiful roads over different parts of this battlefield, and this is as important and necessary as any of them in order to complete that general work. We have a man in charge up there, and pay him a sum of money each year to take charge of the battlefield. That has been the policy of this Government. I am not now speaking of the cemetery. We have a man in charge of the battlefield who has nothing to do with the cemetery.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts insist on the point or order?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. No; I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. KEIFER), there were—ayes 6, noes 41.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Confederate Mound, Oakwood Cemetery, Chicago: For care, protection, and maintenance of the plat of ground known as "Confederate Mound" in Oakwood Cemetery, Chicago, $250.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a verbal amendment, to change the word "plat" to "plot."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 112, in line 21, strike out "plat" and insert "plot."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized on a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, in 1898 the late lamented and loved President McKinley, in addressing the Georgia legislature, said:

I believe that in the providence of God the time has now arrived when it is the duty of the Government to provide for the care of the graves of the Confederate dead.

Many acts of President McKinley's Administration testify to his sincere and earnest desire to reunite the sections of our country and to enable it to forget the bitterness of the past; but this noble sentiment uttered by him, and which has found realization in this provision in this bill and one in a former bill and in another passed at this session, in my judgment, has had as much or more force in bringing about such a desired end than any other fact. His untimely death prevented him from witnessing the accomplishment of his noble desire, but his memory will always be cherished by the Confederates and their descendants.

In the national cemetery at Arlington, near this city, there repose the remains of the Confederate soldiers who died in prison in Washington, and who were first buried in the various cemeteries and other places around Washington. The Association of Confederate Veterans in Washington, with the aid and consent of the Government, gathered the remains of these Confederate soldiers and buried them in Arlington, and the Government has provided from the National Treasury marble headstones to mark these graves, with the names and States from which these soldiers came inscribed thereon.

On Sunday last, while attending the memorial services held by the Association of Confederate Veterans, I found among those buried there two soldiers, members of Company G, Fourth Georgia Volunteer Infantry—Fleming Jordan and Benjamin F. Persons. These two young men were natives of the county where I was born, and were members of the company of which my father was the captain, and followed him with the Fourth Georgia Regiment in 1861 to Virginia. They died prisoners of war, and their remains were buried in places unknown to their families and friends, but I find that the Government has provided suitable marble headstones to mark their graves, and that their graves are cared for by the General Government. Over forty years ago, as a child, I recall the day on which these young men left their homes, and it will be a consolation and gratification to the families and friends of these young soldiers to know that their graves are not forgotten, and the fact that the Government of the United States now sees to it that the graves are protected, cared for, and adorned, will be convincing proof that the animosities created by the struggle in which they engaged have died away.

Mr. Chairman, this is the second time that this appropriation has been carried in an appropriation bill for taking care of the "Confederate mound" in the cemetery at Chicago. I think it is due to the author of the bill who first introduced it in the Fifty-seventh Congress, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the report which was made on that bill should be put in the RECORD, and I shall ask permission to do so. Just a word with reference to this and another bill that has become a law at this session. I will not detain the committee long.

Mr. Chairman, this plat where these soldiers are buried in the cemetery at Chicago contains the remains of 4,039 Confederate soldiers who died as prisoners of war while in prison at Camp Douglas, near Chicago. The graves of Confederate soldiers buried at home need no care from the General Government; they have been cared for by loving hands of the women Confederacy, a care which we would not surrender to the General Government or anyone. Forty-odd years after that great struggle has ended, a struggle which for the valor, chivalry, the devotion to duty of the soldiers upon both sides, challenged the admiration and excited the wonder of the world; forty years after the struggle is over we find in an appropriation bill for the administration of the affairs of the United States a provision appropriating from the General Treasury, administered by those now in power, an ample sum—for it is ample—for the protection and maintenance of this Confederate mound in the city of Chicago, containing the graves of over 3,000 Confederate soldiers. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who sits in front of me, is the author of the bill which provided for nearly $4,000 to fix up and beautify the plat, and that has been done. And it is now one of the most beautiful spots in that resting place of the dead of that great city. At the present session of Congress a bill has been passed which appropriates the sum of $200,000 for the purpose of marking graves of Confederate soldiers who are buried and sleep in Northern States, and already a former Confederate officer has been appointed by the President to carry out the work.

As the son of a Confederate officer, I desire to call attention to what has been done in this bill and in a former bill, and to what has been done by this Congress, that the country may know—that the world may understand—that the United States of America, the greatest Republic that ever was created or given to mankind for the perpetuation of principles of republican government and the liberty of the people, can not and will not perish from the face of the earth. [Applause.] That for all time to come we are a united people. It is, Mr. Chairman, the clearest indication that, although the people were divided in the greatest internecine struggle that history records, the bitterness of that struggle has gone forever. [Applause.] It is but an indication that hereafter the dream of the founders of this Republic will be realized, that the Republic will remain perpetual, and that there need be no fears of its discontinuance. [Applause.]

Now, in order that due credit may be given to the gentleman who introduced this bill, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and in order that the people may know about this Confederate mound at Chicago, what it is, how it originated, and how it is preserved and how it was taken care of up to 1903, I will insert the report I referred to in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. It was taken care of up to the time when this appropriation was first made by the Confederate soldiers who resided in Chicago, by the donations from the men and women in the South, who in their poverty, distress, and want from 1865 on have contributed their means not only for the purpose of beautifying and marking the graves of Confederate soldiers and building monuments to them in the South, but also to caring for the graves of those who lay in Northern States; out of their poverty they have contributed much for the purpose of marking Confederate graves and putting monuments to them in the Southern States.

Now that we are grown strong and great, for all the States in the South that formed the "Confederate States" are now strong and rich, great and powerful; now that we are able out of our abundance to contribute to the keeping not only of the Confederate graves in the South, but those in the North, it is with grateful hearts, Mr. Chairman, that we see in this bill, as in other acts of Congress, a recognition on the part of this Congress of the American people, composed as it is in part of some of the distinguished soldiers who fought in the Union Army from 1861 to 1865, who by their action and by their votes have said that the valor and courage and devotion to duty and performance of duty, as they saw it and understood it, by the men of the Confederate army, deserve that the General Government shall protect and preserve their last resting places, in order that generations hereafter can see and learn and know what deeds they wrought as soldiers of the Confederate Army; that they shall be preserved as the deeds and acts of true Americans. [Applause.] It will teach the world, it will teach our children that the people after the great struggle, after these years that have passed, are so united that Congress recognizes, by writing it in the statutes, that the soldiers who lie buried in the North, by reason of their bravery, their patriotism and chivalry, are entitled to have their last resting places cared for by the General Government out of the common treasury. It is convincing proof that we are indeed a reunited people, united now and forever, and that this Republic will be perpetual. "Esto perpetua," Mr. Chairman, is the prayer of every man from the South. [Great applause.]

The following is the report on the bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] providing for the improvement and care of the Confederate mound in Oakwood Cemetery, Chicago, Ill.:

[House Report No. 2155, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9369) for the improvement and care of Confederate Mound, in Oak Woods Cemetery, Chicago, Ill., and making appropriation therefor, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

A similar bill was reported in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

A copy of said report is herewith submitted and made a part of this report.

[House Report No. 1077, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5789) for the improvement and care of Confederate Mound, in Oak Woods Cemetery, Chicago, Ill., and making an appropriation therefor, beg leave to report and recommend that the bill be amended by striking out all of section 4, and that as so amended the bill be passed.

This bill authorizes the Secretary of War to enter into a contract with the Oak Woods Cemetery Association for the improvement and ornamentation of a plot of ground owned by the United States and known as "Confederate Mound," located in Oak Woods Cemetery, Chicago, Ill., in which are buried 12 Union and 4,039 Confederate soldiers, who died at Camp Douglas, at Chicago, during the war of the rebellion, and limits the expense therefor to the sum of $3,850, and makes an appropriation of that sum, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, for the purpose described. The bill also authorizes the Secretary of War to enter into contract from time to time for the proper care, protection, and maintenance of Confederate Mound at an annual expense not exceeding the sum of $250.

During the war of the rebellion a considerable number of Confederate prisoners was kept in the military prison at Camp Douglas, Chicago. Four thousand and thirty-nine of these prisoners died while in prison and were buried in the Chicago city cemetery.

By two deeds, dated, respectively, April 25, 1866, and May 1, 1867, the United States acquired the title to a plot of ground in the then unimproved portion of Oak Woods Cemetery, and in the year 1867 the remains of the 4,039 Confederate soldiers, and also of the 12 Union soldiers who had died from smallpox at Camp Douglas, were transferred from the Chicago city cemetery to this plot of ground, which has ever since been commonly known as "Confederate Mound," in the Oak Woods Cemetery.

This cemetery is situated within the city limits of the city of Chicago, a short distance from Jackson Park, the site of the World's Fair. The Ex-Confederate Association of Chicago, with the consent of the War Department, has erected on the plot a monument in memory of the Confederate dead buried therein, and has made other efforts to have some improvements put upon the ground. By act of Congress approved January 25, 1895, the Secretary of War was authorized to issue four condemned iron guns and projectiles for the ornamentation of this lot.

While the plot is known as "Confederate Mound," and was probably a slight mound located in the marsh which existed there at the time the Government acquired the title in 1867, yet from representations made to your committee it appears that at the present time Oak Woods Cemetery, which entirely surrounds the Government plot, has been raised so that the plot itself is a low and depressed piece of ground, near the middle of which stands the Confederate monument, in something of a hollow.

No provision has ever been made by the Government for the care and maintenance of the plot, and no expenditure has ever been made by the Government for its improvement. The Oak Woods Cemetery Association has voluntarily cut the weeds growing on this plot twice a year, but no other care has been taken of it. The monument ought to be taken down temporarily, and then, after the mound has been properly filled in, the monument should be erected upon the raised ground. Most of the expense of this work will be the filling. As the Government plot is entirely situated within Oak Woods Cemetery, the bill properly provides that the Secretary of War may enter into a contract with the Oak Woods Cemetery Association for the work to be done.

The graves of the dead buried there are unmarked. There is nothing there to show their names. They belong to those who laid down their lives in defense of what they believed to be the right. Their comrades from the South can not care for their burial places. The States from which they hailed can not watch over their last resting place. Mingled with the bones of the Confederate dead lies the dust of the twelve Union soldiers, whose graves are also unmarked and whose names are unknown. Around the place in which they sleep, under the weeds and water, lie those who have died in civil life, and whose graves are watched over by loving hands and hearts and made beautiful by all the arts that man can devise.

A great nation, grateful to those who died in her service, in loving forgiveness of those who fought against her, and in the hope of drawing nearer and closer together the hearts of all the people, ought not to permit this burial ground owned by it to remain untouched and uncared for.

Your committee attaches hereto and makes a part of this report a letter from the Quartermaster-General of the Army to the Secretary of War, dated June 15, 1899; also a letter from the secretary of the Oak Woods Cemetery Association, dated May 22, 1899, and in connection therewith a letter from the superintendent of the Oak Woods Cemetery Association, dated May 20, 1899.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 15, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a communication from the Hon. JAMES R. MANN, Member of Congress, First district Illinois, Chicago, Ill., respecting the neglected condition of a plot of ground in the Oak Woods Cemetery, near that city, wherein were buried the Confederate soldiers who died at Camp Douglas, in Chicago, and requesting that he be informed of any facts in relation to the power of the War Department at present to improve the property, etc.

In reply thereto you are respectfully informed that it appears that the lot in question was acquired by the United States under two deeds from the president of the cemetery company, dated, respectively, April 25, 1866, and May 1, 1867, which deeds, with accompanying papers, were transferred to the Acting Judge-Advocate-General United States Army August 21, 1894, under orders from the Secretary of War dated May 15, 1894. It further appears that the remains buried in the lot were those of 12 Union soldiers, who died from smallpox at Camp Douglas, and 4,039 Confederate prisoners of war, originally buried in the Chicago City Cemetery, and which were removed to the lot in 1867 under the direction of Col. J. D. Bingham, then chief quartermaster Department of the Lakes, at Chicago.

August 20, 1887, Mr. R. Scullin, assistant secretary Ex-Confederate Association of Chicago, requested permission to erect in the lot a monument in memory of the Confederate dead buried therein, which permission was granted by the Secretary of War August 29, 1887, under such regulations as the Quartermaster-General may deem proper, and on August 31, 1887, the chief quartermaster Department of the Missouri was instructed to select a proper site for the monument.

August 22, 1890, the Hon. Frank Lawler, Member of Congress, forwarded request by W. B. Phipps, that the Confederate Association of Chicago be permitted to put the lot in good condition for the erection of the monument, and on September 6, 1890, Mr. Phipps was informed that permission is granted the association to repair and improve the lot, provided no part of the expense therefor be made a charge against the United States, and that the plans for said repairs be first submitted to and approved by the chief quartermaster Division of the Missouri.

By act of Congress (Public, No. 29) approved January 25, 1895, the Secretary of War was authorized to issue four condemned iron guns and projectiles for the ornamentation of the Government lot in Oak Woods Cemetery, near Chicago, Ill., "in which are buried both Union and Confederate dead."

May 15, 1895, permission was granted Gen. J. C. Underwood, commander northern department United Confederate Veterans, to erect an iron tablet in said lot without expense to the United States, and on August 1, 1895, permission was granted him to erect a suitable flagstaff in the lot, without expense to the United States, for the purpose of occasionally flying the national colors over the graves of the Camp Douglas prison dead interred therein.

From the foregoing report it will be noted that provision for the ornamentation of the lot has heretofore been made by the Government and also by the Confederate Veteran Association, but no appropriation has as yet been made by Congress for its care and maintenance. Such appropriations, if made, should be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Very respectfully,
M. I. LUDINGTON,
Quartermaster-General U. S. A.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

OAK WOODS CEMETERY ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, May 22, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 18th instant to hand, in which you desire certain information concerning the plat of ground in our cemetery where the Confederate soldiers are buried. There are about 2 acres in the plat, and it was purchased by the United States May 1, 1867, of the Oak Woods Cemetery Association. No provision for the care of this plat has ever been made by anyone. When the Government bought this piece of ground it was in the unimproved part of the cemetery. Since then the ground around it has been filled and improved, leaving that plat much below grade and in a very uneven condition.

I herewith inclose you a small diagram of the plat and a statement from our superintendent as to the condition of the ground and what it would cost to put it in proper shape; also the cost per annum to maintain same to conform to the rest of the cemetery. Any further information you may wish we would be pleased to furnish you.

Yours, very respectfully,
OAK WOODS CEMETERY ASSOCIATION,
WM. E. VANDERVORT, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
No. 175 Dearborn Street, City.

CHICAGO, May 20, 1899.

DEAR SIR: With reference to the Confederate mound I submit the following: The section is at present in deplorable condition. It is 3 to 4 feet lower than the burial mounds immediately adjacent to it, which, with the irregularity of the surface, leaves no way to dispose of the water except to slowly filter away through the sand. Then, again, the surface of the mound itself is very uneven, the north end being fully 7 inches higher than the center, at which latter point the monument stands. This feature—viz, the monument standing at the lowest point of the mound—is one of the principal defects in the appearance of the section. The surface is also broken by depressions, and in some places actual holes appear, and very little grass is growing, the weeds being thick. At present we cut the section with scythes twice yearly. As for trees, there are about 40 old soft maples, every one of which has been broken off at the top during wind storms, and this necessitated our cutting and trimming them until they appear little better than stumps.

To bring the mound up to the standard of the surroundings the following is suggested:

The center of the section, where the monument stands, should be raised 3 feet and a gradual slope given to the mound toward the edges, the principal pitch to be south, and this could be done in such a manner as to take care of the water very nicely, and also to make a symmetrical connection with the adjacent property. The rise may be varied, that is, made less toward the center of the mound, if thought best, and this arrangement would allow of the placing of the cannon now on the ground to good advantage. Either way the expense would be equal. The surface would require seeding for grass, and water pipes should be laid through the section to provide for the sprinkling of the grass and watering of such young trees as may be set out. The old trees should be entirely removed and some suitable planting scheme followed with hardy nursery stock, such as the experience here approves. A suitable arrangement would be to plant in concentric lines to conform to the elliptical shape of the mound, placing the outside trees about 25 feet apart and the inner lines 50 feet apart.

As to the cost of this improvement, about 5,000 yards of filling would be required. This varies in price at different seasons according to the supply in the neighborhood. A fair average price, including the handling and grading, would be 50 cents per yard. To take down and set up the monument would cost $500, and 3 feet of foundation to bring it up to the new grade would cost $250. The seeding for grass would cost $25. Piping to meet our point of distribution would require 500 feet of 2-inch and 1,000 feet of 1-inch pipe, which at the present market price, with the necessary valves installed complete, would be worth $175.

The trees planted as suggested above would require about 80, and in selected nursery stock of an average height of 10 feet, properly watered to insure their growth, would be worth $5 each.

It is possible to secure a much better appearance than at present with less expense than the grading above suggested by simply resurfacing the section, although the effect would not compare with the other. This latter arrangement would require about $75 worth of filling and a labor expenditure of $250, and would mean that the monument should be left in its present low position and the section given a flat fieldlike appearance. While this would not conform with the surroundings, it would give an opportunity to keep well cut and trimmed. The removal of the old trees would in either case be in order, at a cost of $100.

As to the permanent care of the grounds to correspond with the surrounding property, this would mean the cutting of the grass with lawn mowers, the trimming of the same about the trees, monument, etc., the trimming of the trees in season, and the usual raking to keep the ground free from litter. This would require an outlay of $100 annually. In addition to this, the grass should be watered similarly as is done on the private lots in the cemetery. The watering would be worth $150 annually. The above figures are made after a careful survey of the ground and a due consideration for getting them as low as the work can be properly performed, with a view, if possible, of having the Government section brought up to the park standard of our own grounds.

Yours, truly,
EDWARD G. CARTER,
Superintendent.

WM. E. VANDERVORT, Esq., Secretary, Chicago.

The Clerk read as follows:

Military posts: For the construction and enlargement of buildings at such military posts as, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, may be necessary, for the erection of barracks and quarters for the artillery in connection with adopted project for seacoast defenses, and for the purchase of suitable building sites for said barracks and quarters, $750,000; but no part of the money appropriated for military posts shall be used for the purchase of any land except as herein specifically provided.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 16, page 114, insert:

"For the payment of claims for damage done by the Army of the United States while engaged in target practice, as follows: F. Krant, Leon Springs, Tex., $325; Margaret Neutze, Leon Springs, Tex., $100; R. A. Proctor, Cheyenne, Wyo. (two claims), $125; Ellen Peach, Brighton, Mich., $59; Bowsett Company (Limited), of Honolulu, Hawaii, $40, a total of $649."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment. I would say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] that if it has any proper place at all on an appropriation bill it would be on the general deficiency bill and not on this bill. Nevertheless, I do not want to prevent the gentleman from making a statement in regard to it, and for that reason have reserved the point of order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, these small items aggregate a total of $649. They are various small sums found to be due by the Government to individuals by boards of officers appointed for the purpose of surveying and reporting on the amount of damages done. They have been recommended several times, some of them at least, for appropriation and payment. They were estimated for by the Quartermaster-General. Estimates were submitted. The debt is undisputed. The amount is not large. It is very much needed by the people who will be the beneficiaries if the amendment should be adopted. There is no reason that I can see why the Government should not pay its just debts, particularly in such small amounts, at this time and in this way. Every military officer who has examined into it, and they were particularly charged with that examination, has found them to be just, and reported that they should be paid. The Secretary of the Treasury has transmitted the recommendations of the Secretary of War that the claims be appropriated for. They have all been carefully examined and found to be just debts, and I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that one of them I have personal knowledge of—that of $100 due for the killing of the two horses of Mrs. Neutze while engaged in making a crop, which deprived her of the only means she had of making the crop. A merchant in my town stood good for her at the bank to get enough money to buy other horses to take the place of those which had been killed, and that gentleman relied upon the good faith of the Government to make prompt settlement for such manifestly proper claims. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not press his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota make the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the claims presented are meritorious, but there are a great many Members of the House right around me here who have suggested that they have similar claims, and if we are going to recognize one we might as well recognize all. It has always been the rule of the Committee on Appropriations to not appropriate for the payment of claims on an appropriation bill. I will therefore insist on the point of order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] if he does not think that claims which have been adjudicated by bodies appointed for that purpose at the time the damage was done and in such insignificant sums should be paid?

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, I think they should be paid; yes. All just claims against the Government should be paid; but if the Committee on Appropriations undertakes to pass upon the merits of these respective claims, it would not have time to do anything else. We have a Committee on Claims, and the adjudication which the gentleman speaks of, while it may be entirely satisfactory, may go into the merits of these propositions, is not such an adjudication as is recognized by the Committee on Appropriations or by Congress to entitle the claims to a place on an appropriation bill. The adjudication that is recognized is an adjudication authorized by law, an adjudication in the Court of Claims, and when there has been such an adjudication and a certificate of the same by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress for payment, such claims are always carried on appropriation bills.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman is bound in candor to admit that when these officers examined into the matter at that particular time and took the testimony, it is certain to be the evidence upon which any claim would be ultimately adjudicated, and certainly more apt to be correct now than if delayed a year or two or three for hearing and determination. Will the gentleman who says that he thinks these claims are probably correct consent, if they are and if the military authorities who examine them report them to be such, to provide for them in his general deficiency bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not consent to any proposition of that kind in advance of knowing just what the facts are, whether they are claims that come within the rule of the committee, namely, that they have been adjudicated under some provision of law authorizing their adjudication and certification to Congress. Claims of that kind when certified by the Secretary of the Treasury after due adjudication are carried without question upon appropriation bills.

A number of gentlemen sitting near me here have suggested that if this claim is allowed then the damages sustained by a number of men in a certain explosion which occurred some years ago ought to be paid, about which there is no more question than there is about this. I regret very much that it becomes my duty to insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota insists upon the point of order. Has the gentleman from Texas anything to say upon the point?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not see how it is possible for this House, which after all merely wants evidence of the justice of the claim and the propriety of its payment, to ever get evidence as good as this again. These cases were examined into at the time the damage was done by officers of the Government familiar with the facts personally investigating them upon the ground at that very time, and to delay the appropriation is almost equivalent to denying the payment of the claims.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Texas permit a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Have you introduced a bill for the payment of these claims?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No, Mr. Chairman; I have not, because I had a little experience in that line in this body three or four years ago. I had a claim from my district, made and based upon a contract entered into with the Quartermaster of the United States Army in August, 1865, not a penny of it disputed, every item of the account promptly certified to, every officer of the Government before whom it came through those nearly forty years certifying that it was just, that the Government had the services and the goods, and that it ought to be paid, and yet the old man in whose favor that claim was made, after struggling along in poverty for more than thirty years, was on his deathbed before it passed. He heard not thirty minutes before his death that finally and with shameful tardiness the Government of the United States had consented to pay him the principal of a debt which it had admitted all the time it had owed him since the summer of 1865 and with not a penny of interest. I admit, sir, that this is probably contrary to the rules of the House, and that if the gentleman insists on his point of order the item will go out, but, sir, he seems unwilling to agree that just debts like this, small in amount, though big to the poor people to whom they are due, will be provided for in the general deficiency bill, where he says they properly belong.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Texas permit a question again?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I may say to the gentleman there are a number of bills on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims almost identical with his claim. The gentleman from Nebraska, sitting at my right here, has a claim that is almost identical with the claim presented by the gentleman, and, of course, if the committee were to allow the claims referred to in his amendment to go on the bill it would be in a position where, in order to be consistent, it would have to allow all, and the only thing to do——

Mr. SLAYDEN. I hope the gentleman will have better fortune than I had. I had bills on the Calendar for years recommending payment of claims which had been brought in here through the Committee on Claims, but, sir, with the one exception mentioned I never got action on them. Congress after Congress I offered a bill; Congress after Congress it was reported favorably and placed upon the Calendar, and Congress after Congress I was denied the privilege of taking it up out of its turn, and there is not a Member of the House who does not know that the Calendar is the burial ground of the hopes of all claimants.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Land for target range: For the purchase of 5,400 acres of land, more or less, near Camp Douglas, in Juneau County, Wis., as a site for a target range for infantry and light artillery, $150,000: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be available until the State of Wisconsin shall have made a valid grant to the United States of the right to use the State encampment grounds near Camp Douglas, exclusive of buildings thereon, for infantry and artillery practice without cost to the United States so long as said grounds are used and owned by the State for encampment purposes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 115, at the end of line 23, add a new paragraph, as follows: "Land for target range: For the purchase of a tract of land, of 3,000 acres or less, at American Lake, near Tacoma, State of Washington, for a target range, $30,000."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, this item sought to be covered by the amendment I have offered was one of the items which was included in the estimates sent by the War Department to the Appropriation Committee, and I had hoped that inasmuch as this item had been included in the estimates of the War Department that the Committee on Appropriations would insert this provision in the bill. I will say that the rifle range sought to be covered by this amendment offered by me is said to be one of the most favorable locations for a rifle range in the Pacific northwest.

In the War Department they claim that they have been having a great deal of trouble in securing any proper target range at all, and after a considerable search, after a number of years of investigation, the Government of the United States rents a certain amount of ground in this locality, where they have been conducting a temporary target range, and on that account the War Department made a recommendation and sent up the estimate that $30,000 be appropriated to purchase about 3,000 acres of land at this place.

Now, at this late hour in the session, I do not think I ought to consume any more time on this matter, although there is a great deal that might be said. The War Department need this target range, and have submitted an estimate of $30,000, and the amendment I have offered seeks to carry out this purpose. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that under the circumstances a point of order properly lies against an item of this kind, for the reason that a target range is a necessary incident to the Army. And I also wish to state that these items have always been carried in the appropriation bills. This item was carefully considered by the committee, and some members of the committee had personal knowledge of the situation and came to the conclusion that, under all the circumstances, it was not at this time wise to appropriate the money for the purpose of this very large tract of land. It would be used principally by the troops who are stationed at Vancouver Barracks, Forts Lawton, Wright, Flagler, Casey, Worden, and Walla Walla, or by all of them, if necessary. But it is not centrally located. It is not desirable, and, as it appears from the testimony, there is plenty of ground occupied now and owned by the Government in the vicinity of these several posts to accommodate the troops in the matter of target practice. And for that reason the committee felt that at this time it was not necessary to make this appropriation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I renew it. It strikes me that this amendment is not in order. It is not one of the necessary incidents of the Army that can be classed with Army supplies, like guns and ammunition—the purchase of several sections of land for target practice. I thought at the time the paragraph preceding the amendment was read that it was not in order. I do not care to debate it, but I call the attention of the Chair to the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] anything to say on the point of order?

Mr. CUSHMAN. No, sir.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, after appropriating $50,000 for his Mount Rainier Park, he does not think it would be better to keep this item until next session? Otherwise you will exhaust your possibilities in one session of Congress.

Mr. CUSHMAN. That might be, but inasmuch as the War Department, who are supposed to have the best information on this subject, has recommended this appropriation, I offered the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to read the testimony, which is very brief, taken before the committee:

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is for land for target range, American Lake, Washington; for the purchase of a tract of land of about 3,000 acres, at American Lake, near Tacoma, Wash.—

And I might say, in passing, that the good citizens of Tacoma have a magnificent club house at American Lake, which will probably profit very materially by the purchase of this target range—$30,000.

General HUMPHREY. This range is back of Tacoma, about 150 miles from Portland.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are the troops that would use this range?

The general then recites the location of these troops, which I gave a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not think that we could secure land in the vicinity of Portland, where the expense of transportation would be very much less?

General HUMPHREY. We have in hand now the contemplated purchase or renting incident to purchase of a range for small arms in the vicinity of Vancouver Barracks.

I submit that the amendment ought not to be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has raised a point of order. The Chair thinks it is clearly obnoxious to the rule and subject to the point of order. The Chair thinks you might purchase land next to an army post and that it would probably be a continuation of a public work, but it is evidently not in order to purchase a separate piece of land, as this amendment proposes. It is no more in order, in the opinion of the Chair, than it would be to provide on an appropriation bill for the erection of a hospital building or the construction of an army post without a previous authorization of law therefor. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

International Waterways Commission: For continuing the work of investigation and report by the International Waterways Commission, authorized by section 4 of the river and harbor act approved June 13, 1902, $20,000.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 116, in line 20, insert "and retired officers of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, shall be eligible for service on said Commission."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the point of order, I would like to have an explanation.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will state this as the reason for offering this amendment. This Commission is made up of three members from the United States, one an officer of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army; one a civilian engineer, well versed in hydraulics of the Great Lakes; one a lawyer, well versed in international and riparian law. These are the qualifications required by the statute. This Commission was created by the act of 1902, and entered upon its work somewhat later. The member selected from the engineer force of the United States soon reaches the age of retirement. He is an efficient man and performed important service, is president of the Commission, both American and Canadian, and it will be unfortunate for the efficiency of this body to have him go out at the age of retirement.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman. I reserved the point of order for the purpose of ascertaining the facts. Will this gentleman receive two salaries after he becomes retired?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I am really not informed about that. As I understand it, while he is on the active list he receives but one salary.

Mr. MANN. While on the active list?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. He can not receive anything further.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois he can only draw anything in addition to retired pay when it is specifically otherwise provided.

Mr. MANN. It depends upon what the act provides which authorized the Commission. If the act authorizing the Commission authorized the payment of a salary, and then we pass this act authorizing the appointment of officers on the retired list, then it becomes a part of the law.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. This does not authorize the payment of a specified salary.

Mr. MANN. This does not.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The act provides this: For the purpose of paying the expenses and salaries of such Commission, the Secretary of War is authorized to expend, etc., the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay that part of the expense of this Commission charged to the United States.

Mr. MANN. If it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of War, I have no doubt only one salary would be paid.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Of course, all I desire is the efficiency of the work of the Commission. But I do not like to have the purpose of the amendment defeated by a tangle about salary. It would be extremely unfortunate to lose the services of this man, the president, who has done more work than anyone else on the Commission. I have no objection to any amendment obviating any reasonable objection as regards salary.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that my colleague from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] thinks that same remark applies to a great many Army officers, dispensing with their services when they become valuable.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio if it is not a fact there was payment for the service of this Commission during the waterways convention?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. They had no regular salary. There was an apportionment of compensation by the Secretary of War according to the amount of services they rendered and their value, in the judgment of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. If it is within the discretion of the Secretary of War, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he make it so plain that there can be no misunderstanding.

Mr. MANN. I do not think any harm will be done, if it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improvement of the Yellowstone National Park: For maintenance and repair of improvements, $55,000, to be expended by and under the direction of the Secretary of War; and to be immediately available.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill how much of this $55,000 is for repairs, and how you want to repair the Yellowstone National Park?

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman ever been in the park?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I regret that I have not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I do not know whether I can inform the gentleman or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a good deal of money for repairs. I will say that I have been through a good many other places out West that I have found very pleasant to visit.

Mr. MANN. There are roads and bridges and buildings to be repaired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. This item was $133,000 last year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand the item was $133,000 last year.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And $250,000 the year before.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And $250,000 the year before.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And $250,000 the year before that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And $250,000 the year before that. It looks to me as though it is a good deal of money.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will cease prompting the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I was only trying to show the gentleman from Tennessee that it is not a large item in comparison.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts has done magnificent work for his country by pointing out things in this bill, even if he has to use such an humble messenger as myself to do a part of it. I should really like to know how it is we are expending so much money there, and what we are doing.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will examine the hearings he will ascertain that there are something over 300 miles of road in the Yellowstone National Park that must be maintained, and also a large number of bridges that must be kept in repair, and the amount is less this year than it has been for a great many years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much has it cost all told?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am unable to state to the gentleman. There have been over a million dollars expended in improvements there in the last six years.

Mr. LACEY. Does this contemplate the construction of the bridge across the canyon below the falls?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no new construction contemplated, as I understand it. This also includes the cost of maintaining the sprinkling service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much have we spent there altogether?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Since 1886 we have expended $1,646,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think I will go out there. I should like to see a park where we have spent that much money.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will go out there he will no longer take up the time of the House in asking questions concerning conditions there.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, our time here is paid for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park: For continuing the establishment of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park; for the compensation and expenses of two civilian commissioners, maps, surveys, clerical and other assistance, messenger, office expenses, and all other necessary expenses; foundations for State monuments; mowing; historical tablets, iron and bronze; iron gun carriages; for roads and their maintenance, completing the inclosing of Point Park; the purchase of small tracts of lands, the purchase of which has heretofore been authorized by law; in all, $30,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

HUGH DONNELLY.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of H. R. 17001, to correct the military record of Hugh Donnelly, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

REPRINT OF THE COPYRIGHT BILL.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. CURRIER, a reprint was ordered of the bill H. R. 18953—the copyright bill.

REPORT OF COOLEY COMMISSION ON FREE PASSES.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the report of the Cooley Commission and its recommendations as to the amendment of the free-pass law. Amongst other things it recommends an amendment to permit the families of railroad employees, persons injured in accidents, nurses, and doctors to have free passes, which I think everybody wants.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the matter referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Excerpts from reports of Cooley Interstate Commission. Vol. 3, Interstate Commerce Commission Report, March, 1889, to May, 1890, p. 297.]

FREE PASSES AND FREE TRANSPORTATION.

On the 3d of May the Commission entered upon an investigation concerning free passage and free passenger transportation. Information received from time to time had given reason to believe that passes for interstate transportation, or having some relation to interstate business, were issued to some extent, at least, by some, if not most of the railroad companies. The intention of the Commission was to make the investigation general, covering all the interstate lines of the country, but pressure of other business compelled the postponement of much of the investigation to a later period. As the investigation has not been completed, only a limited report upon the subject can be made at the present time.

INVESTIGATION HAD—RESULT.

The companies first summoned were those operating in the Middle and New England States—twenty-seven in all. They were called upon, by order, to answer and set forth the persons and classes of persons to whom they had severally issued free passes or free transportation, other than their own officers and employees and the officers and employees of other railroad companies, since November 1, 1888, and the condition and limitations connected therewith, with explanation showing how and why these acts were done; and the statements should be properly verified.

SUMMONS RAILROADS.

Representatives of all the companies summoned appeared at the hearing in Washington, and all except three companies produced statements, in compliance with the summons, showing the number of passes issued, the persons and classes of persons to whom they were issued, and the reasons for their issue. The three companies that furnished no statements of the character called for answered that they issued passes to be used only within their respective States and that for such transportation they were not subject to the act to regulate commerce, and therefore declined to show to what persons or for what reasons the passes were issued. Whether or not companies taking this ground can be compelled to disclose the particular persons to whom free transportation was given, in order that it may appear whether the passes were intended or used for interstate journey, or in any respect a device to favor interstate shippers, has not yet been determined.

STATEMENTS FILED BY RAILROADS.

The statements filed by the companies that produced lists showing that passes have been issued to divers classes of persons and for a variety of reasons and mainly for use within a State, and claimed that for that reason not to be in violation of the act to regulate commerce. It also appears that to a limited extent passes have been issued for interstate journeys by many of the companies.

PASSES GIVEN TO WHOM.

The persons who have had free transportation, as shown by these returns, are embraced in the following classes: Railroad directors, drovers, expressmen, telegraph men, news company agents, officers of palace car companies, managers of excursions and shows; persons injured on railroads, transported to their homes; attorneys, surgeons, persons on company's business; in consideration of contracts for purchase of land, water right, and rights of way; for services rendered, witnesses for companies, in consideration of advertising, hotel and boarding house proprietors, newspaper men, shippers, complimentary, special car accommodations; to persons on request of others, no reason given; for charitable purposes, benevolent associations; exemployees, and families of deceased employees; members of legislative bodies, State railroad commissioners; United States, State, and municipal officers; employees of the Railway Mail Service, officials of steamship and steamboat lines.

USE OF LESSENED BY LAW OF 1887.

Under some of these classes the transportation has been very limited. Under others the number carried have been more numerous, but that a great diminution of free transportation has taken place since the act, especially in interstate transportation, is very evident.

PERMISSIBLE EXEMPTIONS.

Some of the classes carried free there would seem to be no reason to question the propriety of, such as persons injured in railroad accidents, surgeons attending such persons, and witnesses for companies in judicial proceedings and investigations. Where contracts have been entered into prior to the act for free carriage of specified persons in consideration of conveyance of rights of way or other property rights to companies, courts have held in some instances that they were enforceable and rested upon lawful considerations. Employees of express companies and telegraph companies operating upon the line of railroad under agreements with the railroad company, and employees of the Railway-Mail Service, are clearly distinguishable from ordinary travel.

GIVING PASSES TO OTHER CLASSES CONDEMNED.

With respect to nearly all the other classes to whom free transportation has been given, it would seem clear that no justification can be found for their carriage under the provisions of the act.

According to the returns made, the largest number of interstate passes issued of any class was designated "complimentary." Next in numbers were passes to steamship lines and transfer companies, United States, State, and municipal officers, palace car companies, newspapers, and for advertising. The several other classes were small in proportion.

PASSES IN STATE COMMERCE LARGE.

Of State passes the larger numbers were issued to members of legislatures and drovers, with "complimentaries" next, and United States, State, and municipal, newspapers, and shippers next in numbers; the others being comparatively few.

PURPOSE OF ANTIPASS LAW, 1887.

The statute was undoubtedly framed to prohibit passes of free transportation of persons, as one of the forms of unjust discriminations, favoritism, and misuse of corporate powers, that had grown into an abuse of large proportions and become demoralizing in its influence and detrimental to railroads, both in loss of revenue and in provoking public hostility. One of the minor and meaner phases of this abuse is the distinctive preference shown in various ways by employees, both in service and civility, to holders of passes, as if discrimination by free carriage includes discrimination in treatment of passengers.

OFFICIALS GIVEN PASSES—REASON WHY CONDEMNED.

It was well known that persons who were carried free were to a large extent precisely the persons who had no claim whatever to such favors. They were officials and others, from whom free passes might be expected to secure reciprocal favors, and men of wealth and prominence, who rode at the expense of others less able to pay; or the passes were given to influence business. In nearly all cases not specially exempted by the act the motive in demanding or in giving them was one deserving of no favor.

LAW'S AIM—CORRECT ABUSE.

The law aims at the correction of the abuses of free transportation, and in accomplishing this general purpose some forms of free or reduced transportation that at first view might appear plausible or even unobjectionable in themselves have to fall under its general restriction. The principle of equality, under like conditions, for the traveling public had been grossly violated by the railroads. Favored persons or classes of persons had been furnished free transportation at the expense of the general public by higher general charges, to reimburse for gratuitous carriage. The discrimination is equally unjust whether the free transportation be complimentary or to aid some person's business, or for some supposed indirect advantage to the carrier. The correction of the evil and the equality of right to which all are entitled require the restrictions to be general and sweeping to furnish any substantial assurance that the abuse should not be continued or new ones devised under cover of any discretion left to the carrier.

EXCEPTIONS MADE BY LAW AND WHY.

For reasons deemed adequate by the legislative body certain specified exceptions are made in the statute of classes of persons to whom reduced rates or free transportation may lawfully be given, in whose favor discrimination was not deemed unjust. The act provides that it shall not "be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion, or to municipal governments for the transportation of indigent persons, or to inmates of the National Homes or the State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and of soldiers and sailors' orphan homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge, under arrangements with the boards of managers of said homes."

It further provides that it shall not "be construed to prevent railroads from giving free carriage to their officers and employees, or to prevent the principal officers of any railroad company or companies from exchanging passes or tickets with other railroad companies for their officers and employees." The classes of persons that may have reduced rates or free carriage are thus carefully specified in the statute, and their enumeration necessarily excludes all others. Except as qualified by this section, the issuance and sale of passenger tickets must be in accordance with the general principles of this act.

EMPLOYEES' FAMILIES SHOULD BE EXEMPT—RECOMMENDATION OF COMMISSION.

The investigation developed one custom of railroads that seems to be general and to rest on considerations that have no little force. This is the custom of giving free transportation or reduced rates to families of subordinate employees. It is obvious that, for many forcible reasons, the most amicable relations should exist between the railroad companies and their employees, and that the latter should feel that the companies are disposed in all proper ways to manifest an interest in their general welfare. The compensation of these employees is low, the service exacting and often hazardous, their opportunities to give attention to domestic affairs are very limited, and as a rule they are dependent almost entirely on their compensation for the support of their families. It is clearly for the interest of these employees to reside at points on their roads convenient to their business, where homesteads can be acquired and costs of rents and living expenses are moderate. Such locations may often be some distance from points required to be frequently reached by members of their families, such as schools and markets, and it would seem reasonable and no more than an equitable part of their compensation for the company to carry the wives and children of its employees free, or at low rates for fairly necessary purposes. Provision, it would seem, might very properly be made to permit this to be done.

As the investigation of this subject has not been concluded, any further report or action by the Commission is deferred until more complete information shall have been elicited.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR AMENDMENT TO THE ACT—FAMILIES OF EMPLOYEES, NURSES, PHYSICIANS, INJURED PERSONS.

Fourth. It also repeats the recommendation contained in the third annual report that the twenty-second section be so amended as to provide that its provisions shall not prevent the free carriage of persons injured in railway accidents and the physicians and nurses for attendance upon and care of persons so injured, nor prevent the transportation free or at reduced rates of the actual resident members of the families of employees of railways.

REAPPOINTMENT OF MIDSHIPMEN.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6109) authorizing the reappointment of midshipmen recently dismissed from the Naval Academy for hazing, to report it favorably without amendment. I should like to have the bill passed now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to reappoint such of the midshipmen at the Naval Academy recently dismissed for hazing as, in his judgment, may be so reappointed without prejudice to the interests of the naval service: Provided, That each midshipman so reappointed shall be assigned to the class below that of which he was a member when dismissed, and shall take rank therein according to the multiple formerly earned by him while a member of the class which he shall enter under such reappointment: And provided further, That midshipmen so reappointed shall be treated as additional to the number of midshipmen now authorized by law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Maine give us some explanation of the bill. It looks to me as though if we pass this bill we might as well give up trying to control young men at Annapolis, and that we would turn the academy over to their tender mercies.

Mr. HALE. It was found, as a result of the examinations at Annapolis, that there were several cases of technical disobedience, which, under the then existing law, could only be punished by expulsion. There were a number that appealed to everyone as being cases where the punishment was too extreme, and steps were taken and investigations made by the Secretary of the Navy in reference to those cases. At first a bill was introduced naming the midshipmen who might be restored, because of the punishment being so far beyond the technical and small offense.

The committee on examination, after conference with the Department and on the suggestion of the President, concluded to report this bill, leaving the entire subject-matter to the Secretary and the President, or formally to the President. So, instead of its being fought out here on a bill naming persons, the whole matter is sent for examination to the Department, or to the President.

It will clearly apply only—and in that we may trust the executive officers—to cases where the Senator from West Virginia and I would agree that the extreme punishment of expulsion from the academy and from a chosen course upon which the young men have entered should not be enforced.

I have no doubt it is a wise measure, and it does not, as the result will be seen hereafter, in any way tend to encourage hazing.

Mr. SCOTT. I know the Senator from Maine is very careful, and no doubt he has given this subject very careful consideration in committee. During the trial of the young men and since the court-martial proceedings have been made public, in conversation with officers of the Naval Academy, they have told me that the fact that we restored some of the young men a year or two ago who had been dismissed for hazing had been the cause of the revolt, as you might call it, or the determination on the part of these youngsters to disregard the rules of the academy; that we, as legislators, were responsible for the conduct and the violation of the rules of the Naval Academy, whereby these young men took upon themselves to be commanding officers and to prescribe rules that the younger members entering the academy should be expected to live up to.

Now, Mr. President, are we again going to restore these young men to their classes in the Naval Academy and then again have the spectacle of ordering a court-martial to try the same young men, or others who will be encouraged by the fact that they can disobey the laws laid down to them for the government of the academy, with the expectation on their part, judging the future by the past, that they will say to themselves, "We can be restored; we have influence enough to restore us again to the academy."

Mr. President, I certainly am at this moment opposed to the passage of the bill, unless the Senator from Maine, or others, can convince me that I am wrong. I do not want to lay a straw in the way of a young man who is deservingly entitled to be restored, but I have no doubt some of these young men should be kept out.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to interrogate the Senator from Maine. I was unable to attend the committee meeting at which the bill was acted on. I should like to ask whether it is simply retroactive or whether it refers also to cases occurring in the future?

Mr. HALE. It applies only to the present conditions.

Let me state further, which perhaps I in my desire not to take up too much of the time of the Senate ought to have said before, that I agree with the Senator from West Virginia that the restoration by act of Congress of the cadets a year or more ago was a mistake. That was a pronounced case of bad hazing. I did not vote for it and it got through only by great opportunity.

In this case it was found in the trial of these midshipmen that such was the fixed and ironclad statute that for the slightest offense all had to be expelled. Everybody realized that there ought to be some elasticity; and since then we have passed an act to remedy that and allow graded punishment, so that for slight, merely nominal, hazing the punishment of demerits and lowering of rank can be resorted to.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to make a suggestion to him? I suggest to the Senator that when these men were convicted there was no accepted definition of hazing at the Annapolis Academy, and anything that might possibly be construed into hazing was so construed necessarily.

Mr. HALE. All of that was attended to by the statute which we passed fixing what hazing would mean, and making the punishment elastic.

This bill, I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, is intended only to apply and will only apply to the cases where under the law we have enacted these midshipmen would not have been expelled. The extreme cases—or real, hard, unjustifiable, brutal, cruel hazing—would never come under this act. It will be made to apply only to the midshipmen who, if the law had been then as now would not have been expelled. That is the only object of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator, first, how many will be affected by this measure, and, secondly, whether these persons were convicted of what we understand to be hazing?

Mr. HALE. They were convicted of what at that time was hazing; but in all these cases that will be treated by the Executive the offense was very slight; still it was hazing. There are, I think, seven or eight of them in all, in different parts of the country, and the committee has thought it better that it be dealt with administratively rather than that we should select by name, as was originally proposed, those to whom the benefits of this statute should apply.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I understand also that by the provisions of the bill we increase the number this year—that is, we add to the class; we make it greater for the purpose of securing places for these boys who have been punished by being expelled from the school; and it applies only to them.

Mr. HALE. It applies only to them, and they are put on as extra numbers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADVANCEMENT OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

I call the attention of the senior Senator from Louisiana to the bill.

Mr. McENERY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from California.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that officers of the Navy and Marine Corps advanced in rank for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism, and who since such advancement have been or may hereafter be promoted, shall from the date of the passage of this act be carried as additional numbers of each grade in which they serve.

The motion was agreed to.

MAIL AND PACK TRAIL IN ALASKA.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17510) to provide for a reconnoissance and preliminary survey of a land route for a mail and pack trail from the navigable waters of the Tanana River to the Seward Peninsula in Alaska, and for other purposes, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

INTERNAL-REVENUE RECORDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. From the Committee on Finance, I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 14968) to amend the internal-revenue laws so as to provide for publicity of its records. It is a very short bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 1, line 12, to strike out the word "person" and insert "prosecuting officer of any State, county, or municipality;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 3 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and hereby is, amended in section 3240, so as to read:

"SEC. 3240. Each collector of internal revenue shall, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, place and keep conspicuously in his office, for public inspection, an alphabetical list of the names of all persons who shall have paid special taxes within his district, and shall state thereon the time, place, and business for which such special taxes have been paid, and upon application of any prosecuting officer of any State, county, or municipality he shall furnish a certified copy thereof, as of a public record, for which a fee of $1 for each 100 words or fraction thereof in the copy or copies so requested may be charged."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend the internal revenue laws so as to provide for certified copies of certain records."

JAMES N. ROBINSON AND SALLY B. M'COMB.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10610) for the relief of James N. Robinson and Sallie B. McComb, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to report the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It was not a unanimous report. There were two votes in the Committee on Claims against the report.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the bill go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

ITEMS IN CONFERENCE REPORTS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber on yesterday when the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] made a point of order against an item in the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

I did not hear the debate, but I have read it with great interest in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this morning. I notice that in that debate the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], a member of the Committee on Rules, a very wise parliamentarian, quoted from a decision rendered by the late Vice-President Hobart to sustain his contention that a point of order can properly lie in the Senate against an item in a conference report on an appropriation bill.

I remember, Mr. President, the very interesting discussion which took place at that time, the date being July 21, 1897, and I recall very clearly the decision of Vice-President Hobart on that question. I was surprised to note in the RECORD that the Senator from Massachusetts contended that the decision of Vice-President Hobart was in favor of the contention that a point of order would lie against an item in the conference report on an appropriation bill, my recollection being to the contrary.

I have taken the liberty, Mr. President, to go back to the RECORD, and I have very carefully read and reread the decision of the late Vice-President Hobart made at that time. I want to say that it confirms absolutely the view I then held and since have held that in this body a point of order does not lie against an item in a conference report.

The decision of the late Vice-President is not very lengthy, and if Senators do not object I should like to have it read by the Secretary. There are two sentences in it, however, that it seems to me decide the contention absolutely in favor of those who hold that a point of order would not lie. He said, for instance:

Only the action of the Senate upon the vote taken upon concurrence has that power.

And again:

The Chair decides that the point is not well taken.

That would seem to settle it. Perhaps it is just as well that I shall ask that the entire opinion as rendered by the late Vice-President be printed in the RECORD without reading. I have marked it in the bound volume.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has not the opportunity to look up any of the precedents that may exist on similar points of order made heretofore to the relevancy of items like the one in question contained in a conference report. The present occupant of the chair feels that it would be an unwelcome task if he is obliged to decide as to whether any or every amendment made in conference is germane to the original bill, or germane to the amendments made in either House or both Houses, or whether a conference report as submitted to the Senate contains new and improper or irrelevant matter.

The rules of the Senate certainly do not provide for such action, and the Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Arkansas and of the Senate to the fact that this conference report has been adopted by one House in this perfected shape, and that this report is now submitted here as a whole for parliamentary discussion and decision in the form of concurrence or disagreement.

All arbitrary ruling on a point of order like this after the bill has been fully passed by one House and approved by it can not be within the power of any presiding officer.

He can not decide while such a report is being discussed and during the progress of its presentation that matter has been inserted which is new or not relevant, and thus decide what should or should not have been agreed upon. It is not the province of the Chair.

All such questions are such as should go before the Senate when it votes upon the adoption or rejection of the report, which is the only competent and parliamentary action to be taken.

If the Senate itself can not amend this report, and it admittedly can not, the Chair can not do more in that respect than the Senate itself. The Senator from Arkansas asks the Chair by its decision to do that which the Senate itself can not do, to amend this conference report. It is not possible to amend by such a method. The Senate must decide for itself as to the competency of this report in all particulars and the relevancy of all amendments.

No rule or practice permits the presiding officer to annul the action of a conference committee, and thus indirectly to amend it. The Chair has not the power to thus negative the action of a free conference and send a passed bill back to a new conference without a vote. Only the action of the Senate upon the vote taken upon concurrence has that power.

The effect of such a decision, if made, can only be surmised. Where would the bill go if thus amended? Not to the conference committee, for that has been dissolved upon the making of its report to the other House and acceptance there. Not to the Senate conferees, for they have concluded their action also. Possibly to the Senate Finance Committee, where the bill started many months ago. Such a decision, therefore, that paragraph No. 396, contained in the conference report, contains new matter or new legislation, or is not germane or relevant, might be tantamount to indefinite postponement of the bill. Surely the Chair has no such power, and if exercised would be arbitrary in the highest degree.

The Chair decides that the point is not well taken. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 55th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 30, pt. 3, pp. 2786, 2787.)

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, all the answer I desire to make is that if, under the rules of the Senate, a point of order can not be made and considered against the action of a conference committee exceeding its powers, then the rules of the Senate need a prompt amendment, and I shall introduce at once an amendment providing that the President of the Senate himself shall decide it, subject, of course, to appeal to the Senate.

I will add that it seems to me the better practice would be to make the point of order and have it disposed of. To spend two or three days discussing every provision in a conference report and finally have the Senate reject it, because the conference committee has exceeded its power, seems to me worse than a waste of time.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1160) granting an increase of pension to Eliza Swords.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18198) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, and Mr. BURLESON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House further insists on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama managers at the conference on the part of the House.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Canadian Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none; and the Senator from Texas is excused from further service on the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I ask the adoption of the following order providing for the filling of vacancies in certain of the committees of the Senate:

Ordered, That Mr. WHYTE be appointed to fill the vacancies in the Committee on Irrigation, the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Committee on the Library, the Committee on Printing, and the Committee on Canadian Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be agreed to.

HEIRS OF JOHN C. RIVES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the message from the House of Representatives in reference to Senate bill 4376 be now laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4376) to quitclaim all the interest of the United States of America in and to a certain lot of land lying in the District of Columbia and State of Maryland to heirs of John C. Rives, deceased; which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the United States hereby relinquishes all the right, title, and interest it may have acquired by the will of John C. Rives, deceased, in and to a certain lot of land lying partly in the District of Columbia and partly in the State of Maryland, consisting of about 52 acres, more or less, as described in the will of said testator.

And to amend the title so as to read:

A bill to relinquish all the interest of the United States of America in and to a certain lot of land lying in the District of Columbia and State of Maryland, formerly belonging to John C. Rives, deceased.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF CHANNELS ON NEW JERSEY SEACOAST.

Mr. DRYDEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6167) to improve the channels along the New Jersey seacoast.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill asked for by the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to hear that bill read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 2, section 1, line 15, after the word "improvements," to insert:

And provided further, That this act shall not be construed as affecting in any way the jurisdiction and control of the Federal Government over any waters that may be improved in pursuance of the provisions thereof, nor as exempting such waters from the operation of the laws heretofore or hereafter enacted by Congress for the preservation and protection of navigable waters.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 21, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the conference report on the statehood bill, which was submitted to the Senate a few days ago.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I object. I raise the point that a conference report is the property of the two Houses and can not be withdrawn unless it be done by unanimous consent, nor can it be recommitted.

Mr. President, the practice of the Senate in years gone by was to permit the recommittal of a conference report, but the rule of the House of Representatives prohibited such action. In deference to that rule of the House the practice of the Senate was changed, and during all these years it has never been the practice of the Senate to permit the recommittal of a conference report, much less its withdrawal, without unanimous consent. Upon this proposition I think there can be but one opinion.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I understand that this question has been considered in report No. 1545, made to the Senate in the Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, with the result that it was there held and determined, as I understand, that a conference report could not be withdrawn except by leave, and the authorities are stated in that report. That is a question that I do not care to discuss, but I do not want any erroneous ruling made upon it.

It seems to be conceded that when conferees have made their report their office is at an end; the conference report is before the Senate, and it is also before the House, and the conferees have no further control over their report, except only by permission of the two bodies.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator from Ohio will find upon consulting the authorities to which he refers that in the case cited the conference report was first made to the House of Representatives. The report in that case having been agreed to by the Senate and then made to the House, presented a question essentially different from the question now under consideration.

I think the rule is clear that where the conference report was first made to the House the right to withdraw the report from the Senate would be questionable; but in the case here presented the conference report was first made to the Senate and the report has not been made to the House at all in a parliamentary sense. Under the rule of the House the conference report has only been printed in the RECORD for the information of its Members. The reason for the rule permitting the conferees on the part of the Senate to withdraw a report under these conditions is, I think, very clear.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Senator from Montana assume that there is a rule allowing the withdrawal of such a report without unanimous consent?

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator will find that the uniform practice of the Senate, independent of any rule, sustains the right of the conferees who make the report in the first instance to the Senate to withdraw that report at any time before the Senate takes action upon it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I understand that the Senator from Montana does not contend that under the rule the right of withdrawal exists?

Mr. CARTER. I think the right exists under general parliamentary practice in the Senate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But under no rule?

Mr. CARTER. I do not cite a rule; I cite the practice.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I insist that there is no such rule, and I insist further, with the Senator's permission, that the practice of the Senate does not sustain his contention as to the right of withdrawal without unanimous consent, and that that practice was abandoned in deference to the rule of the House of Representatives, which prohibited it upon the ground that a conference report was the joint property of the two Houses and that it became the joint property of the two Houses immediately upon the report of the conference committee, and requires concurrent action.

Mr. CARTER. With reference to the practice of the Senate, I beg to cite the Senator's attention to the holding of the Chair in the Senate on the 10th of April, in the case of the conference report on the bill relating to the Five Civilized Tribes. If I recall, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] upon that occasion questioned the right of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to have withdrawn the conference report, which withdrawal occurred on the 3d of April. The Chair held, upon the question thus raised by the Senator from South Carolina, that it was the right of the conferees upon the part of the Senate to withdraw a report at any time before the Senate took action upon it.

I think there is reason for that rule, Mr. President. The conferees might be conscious the moment after making a report that an error, typographical or otherwise, had been made, an error appearing upon the face of the report itself.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In the case the Senator cites, where the Senator from South Carolina questioned the withdrawal of a conference report at the request of the Senator from Minnesota, was not that done by unanimous consent? Was there an objection offered; and was not the request granted unanimously? That is all that I am contending for now—that it requires unanimous consent to withdraw a piece of common property that belongs to both Houses; and it can not be withdrawn from the possession of the Senate without unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Montana allow me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. My own impression, Mr. President, was that the view taken by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] was the proper interpretation of the statement made in the Manual of Law and Practice in regard to conferences and conference reports, that such withdrawal required in the Senate and in the House unanimous consent; but it is worded:

59. A conference report may be withdrawn in the Senate on leave, and in the House by unanimous consent.

I have looked at the authorities to make sure as to just what could be done, and I find that the phrase "on leave" means by vote of the Senate.

In the Thirty-second Congress, second session, January 28, 1853, on page 141 of the Journal of the Senate, I find this:

On motion by Mr. Hamlin,

Ordered, That the committee of conference on the part of the Senate have leave to withdraw their report.

Of course it can be done by unanimous consent; but it is perfectly obvious from the single precedent which I cite that leave to withdraw a conference report can be granted on motion.

Mr. BACON. By a majority vote?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the principle upon which the rule rests is certainly modified in the case of the presentation of a conference report to the House of Representatives in the first instance, the House obtaining jurisdiction over the report.

The Senator from Kentucky suggests now that this conference report is the joint property of both bodies. That, I take it, is a statement subject to some qualification. No report has been made to the House. The original papers are wholly and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Senate. A report has been made to this body by the conferees. Upon that report the Senate has taken no action, and I assume, until some action is taken by the Senate, the conferees, in the absence of any relation of the House to the matter, may withdraw the report for the correction of errors or the changing of their judgment with reference to the subject-matter.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I only want to say a word or two. I have no interest in this matter except only to have a correct ruling made. It is a question of parliamentary law that has never before arisen since I have been here in connection with anything I have had especially in hand, and, therefore, it is a new question to me. I have not any doubt, however, from the authorities cited, but that the conference report may be withdrawn by the conferees upon a majority vote granting leave to make such withdrawal.

Of course I do not know just what may result from the withdrawal of this report, but if the conferees for a good cause see fit to ask the privilege of withdrawing the report, I have no objection, so far as I am personally concerned, to that leave being granted. I think, however, it ought to be done upon motion, by leave being granted upon a majority vote. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he should make his application for leave to withdraw his report in the form of a motion to grant leave to withdraw it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, in order to avoid any controversy, which I did not anticipate would arise upon my request to withdraw the report, I move that leave be granted to withdraw the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that leave be granted to withdraw the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I now withdraw the report.

ENTRY OF COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, on yesterday I made objection to the consideration of House bill 17415. It was at the close of the day, and I did not understand the contents of the bill. I have since examined the bill and find it unobjectionable. Therefore I desire to withdraw my objection.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may have present consideration. It was read yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado having withdrawn his objection to it, the Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 17415) to authorize the assignees of coal-land locations to make entry under the coal-land laws applicable to Alaska.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 1 of the act approved April 28, 1904, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to extend the coal-land laws to the district of Alaska,'" approved June 6, 1900, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: "That any person or association of persons, or their assigns, qualified to make entry under the coal-land laws of the United States, shall, upon application to the register of the proper land office, have the right to enter, in rectangular tracts containing 40, 80, 160, 320, or 640 acres, upon the condition hereinafter prescribed, with north and south boundary lines run according to the true meridian, by marking the four corners thereof with permanent monuments, so that the boundaries thereof may be easily traced, any quantity of vacant coal lands of the United States, in the district of Alaska, not otherwise appropriated or reserved by competent authority, not exceeding 160 acres to such individual person or 320 acres to such association, upon payment to the receiver of not less than $10 per acre for such lands where the same shall be situated more than 15 miles from any completed railroad, and not less than $20 per acre for such lands as shall be within 15 miles of such road: Provided, That any person or association of persons severally qualified, as above provided, or their assigns, who have opened and improved, or shall hereafter open and improve, any coal mine or mines upon the public lands, and shall be in actual possession of the same, shall be entitled to a preference right of entry of the mines so opened and improved, for the quantity of land herein prescribed, and any association of not less than four persons, severally qualified as above, or their assigns, who shall have expended not less than $5,000 in working and improving any such mine or mines, may enter not exceeding 640 acres, including such mining improvements: And provided further, That where, prior to the passage of this act, coal lands in Alaska have been in good faith located by qualified persons or associations of persons for the quantity prescribed by sections 2347 and 2348 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, extended to Alaska by the act of June 6, 1900, they or their assigns may, upon compliance with the other provisions of the coal-land laws applicable to Alaska, hold and enter the tracts so located to the extent allowed by said sections 2347 and 2348: And provided further, That all such locators shall within one year from the passage of this act, or within one year from making such location (except where this has already been done) file for record in the recording district and with the register and receiver of the land district in which the lands are located or situated, a notice containing the name or names of the locator or locators, the date of the location, the description of the lands, and a reference to such natural objects or permanent monuments as will readily identify the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NELSON. The title should be amended.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend an act approved April 28, 1904, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the coal-land laws to the district of Alaska,"' approved June 6, 1900."

Mr. SPOONER subsequently said: Mr. President, I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill extending the coal-land laws of the United States to Alaska was passed. I do not wish to ask for a vote on my motion now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

OSAGE INDIANS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15333) for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes.

This is a House bill. It is somewhat lengthy and there are several committee amendments. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for committee amendments.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the bill?

Mr. LONG. It is a bill providing for the division of the lands or the allotment of the lands of the Osage tribe of Indians in Oklahoma. There are a few committee amendments.

Mr. SPOONER. Has it been called up by unanimous consent?

Mr. LONG. It has been called up by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a very elaborate bill, Mr. President, and I think it ought not to be passed without some opportunity being given to look into it.

Mr. LONG. I think there can be no objection to the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to read it. I therefore object to its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS IN TRANSIT.

Mr. KEAN. Now, Mr. President, let us have the regular order.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3413.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3413) to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation from one State or Territory or the Distict of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and repealing sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the United States Revised Statutes.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey demands the regular order; which is the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for which I asked consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been stated. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes have it.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BACON. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BACON. In the absence of this proposed action by the Senate, what would be the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] demands the regular order, and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] asks for the yeas and nays on his motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has been read. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 54, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—54.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3413) to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and repealing sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the United States Revised Statutes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was read in full on the 14th of March last.

Mr. KEAN. Let the amendments be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 2, line 10, after the word "hours," to strike out "except upon the written request of the owner or person in custody for that particular shipment, which written request shall be separate and apart from any printed bill of lading or other railroad form, when the time of confinement may be extended to thirty-six hours;" and in line 18, after the word "accidental," to insert "or unavoidable;" so as to read:

That no railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, or the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals shall be conveyed from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or the owners or masters of steam, sailing, or other vessels carrying or transporting cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, shall confine the same in cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a period longer than twenty-eight consecutive hours without unloading the same in a humane manner, into properly equipped pens for rest, water, and feeding, for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented by storm or by other accidental or unavoidable causes which can not be anticipated or avoided by the exercise of due diligence and foresight.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after the word "foresight," to insert:

Provided, That upon the written request of the owner or person in custody of that particular shipment, which written request shall be separate and apart from any printed bill of lading, or other railroad form, the time of confinement may be extended to thirty-six hours.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this is the amendment which, of course, is the main purpose or one of the main purposes of the bill—to extend the time in which cattle may be kept without rest or food or water, on the written request of the owner, from twenty-eight consecutive hours, according to the present law, as I understand, to thirty-six hours. It is done, I understand, to prevent cruelty to animals. Of course the original law was passed with that end in view. I have been unable to see why animals should be better off by being confined thirty-six hours without rest, food, or water than by being confined only twenty-eight. I can understand readily it would be more convenient to the shippers. It would be more convenient to the shippers if there was no legislation whatever.

The proposition that the present law sometimes obliges the shippers to unload cattle at inconvenient hours, it seems to me, does not go very far, because there is no more reason why thirty-six hours should expire at a convenient moment than that twenty-eight hours should expire at a convenient moment. It appears to me on the face of it that it is simply adding eight hours to the time in which live stock may be confined without rest or food or water. I can not, not being very familiar with it, conceive that it is a good thing to keep cattle in the cars an increased length of time. It seems to me it must be bad for them. It must bring them in in a less good condition at the end of their journey, and it must cause them a good deal of additional suffering.

The only personal knowledge that I have as to the movement of animals by rail is in the transportation of horses, and I know how much horses suffer, even under the very best conditions, with men to give them water in the cars and to attend to them, even when they are sent by express. Especially in hot weather is the suffering very great.

It seems to me we ought to have a very good reason before we extend from twenty-eight to thirty-six hours the time during which cattle may be kept in cars, as expressed on the third page of the bill, without rest, food, or water. I have not yet heard such an explanation, and I should be extremely glad to hear one that would convince me that it is cruel to keep animals in cars twenty-eight hours, and that it will tend to prevent cruelty to keep them in such cars thirty-six hours, which the reading of the title of the bill seems to imply.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, replying to the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I will acknowledge that thirty-six hours is too long to keep cattle penned in cars. Twenty-eight hours is too long, twenty hours is too long, eight hours is too long, eight minutes is too long, if it can be avoided.

Mr. SPOONER. Too long for what?

Mr. WARREN. To keep cattle penned up in cars. It is impossible to introduce beef cattle into cars without some injury. The matter of time depends upon circumstances. It would be inhumane to keep stock in cars thirty-six hours unnecessarily, but circumstances alter cases. Take the tame stock, such as are found in the eastern country, such as you can lead out, and they will immediately lie down and rest. No one thinks of their going as long as twenty-eight hours, unless some accident happens, without taking them out. But it is different when you are shipping live stock that will not rest except under the most favorable circumstances. The owner of the stock or his agent is taking it to market to be sold. It will be sold on the market according to its condition. The stock will show any suffering to which it has been submitted. If there has been any cruelty practiced in the loading or unloading or shipping of the stock it takes that much out of the pocket of the owner. Having gone to the limit of the time allowed by law, he often finds himself where there are no proper facilities for unloading or feeding. Under the present law, if enforced, a shipper must stop wherever he is at the end of twenty-eight hours and the shipment must stay just where it is. He can either let the stock stay in the car over night, or be taken out where there is no place to eat or drink or lie down.

When the present law was passed the cars were smaller. They did not have the air-brake attachments. They had no hay-racks. They had no facilities for water. As it is now, almost every car that is loaded with cattle has its racks filled with hay, so while we speak of cattle being without food and water, in the general sense, yet, as a matter of fact, they are provided in a way with food and water. You will notice in cattle cars passing over the road the racks in the top are filled with hay. You will notice down the sides the troughs, although drinking from the troughs is not a success. The droppings and other filth get into the troughs, and we can not water the stock very well. What the stock need is dry, large, roomy yards, where they can be unloaded in the daytime, and where there is clean, running water and where the cattle have room to lie down and rest.

But, I submit, to arbitrarily take the cattle out at the end of twenty-eight hours in the mud or storm, to take them out where there are no facilities, where they mill around and become bruised in getting in and out of the car, is to impose greater suffering than where they are loaded and become fairly contented and within a few hours of good accommodations, and then go on without unloading for a few hours more.

Mr. President, the live-stock men are not hoodlums. They are not cruel men. They have as much care for their live stock surely as those who do not understand cattle and have no financial or other interest in them. The live-stock men, if for no other reason, are compelled to ship their stock in the best way they can and the most humane way, because they thus get more money for them. There is not one-tenth of 1 per cent of the beef supply of this country but is sold upon the market in the way it appears at the end of the shipment when unloaded and placed in the sales yard. If the cattle have been taken out and bruised, as will be the case with wild western cattle taken out arbitrarily at some place where there is no rest, the cattle are in worse condition by far, though they may have traveled but twenty-eight hours, than if they had gone through in thirty or thirty-one or thirty-six hours.

In shipping live stock to market, stockmen invariably have two objects in view; one to get the stock to market in the least possible time, and the other to get it to market in the best physical condition possible.

This bill is not intended to permit cruelty, and the best proof of that is that the Agricultural Department has struggled with this proposition all through the last two years, and it strongly recommends the passage of this bill, giving reasons why. It is not only the matter of extending the time, but there are other points in the bill. For instance, the head of the legal bureau in the Department says, giving the reasons why the bill should pass:

1. For reasons hereinbefore stated, provide that the time during which animals may be confined in cars without food, rest, and water be extended from twenty-eight hours to thirty-six hours.

2. Provide that the cattle must be loaded and unloaded in a humane manner into properly equipped pens. This is a serious omission in the present law.

There is nothing in the present law to compel the unloading into properly equipped pens or which compels the railroad to provide them.

3. Provide that the owner or shipper of the animals may furnish the necessary food if he so desires. Many companies have charged most exorbitant fees for supplying food, and, as the law gives a lien on the stock for food furnished, shippers and owners of stock have been in many cases outrageously overcharged.

Mr. KEAN. Are those the recommendations of the Department?

Mr. WARREN. Those are the reasons given by the legal bureau why the bill should pass.

Mr. KEAN. Is there any provision for inspection and tagging the cattle?

Mr. WARREN. That is not contained in this measure.

Mr. KEAN. Do you not think it ought to be in the bill?

Mr. WARREN. I would rather discuss that on some other measure, I will say to the Senator from New Jersey.

5. The statute should be broadened to cover practically every common carrier of live stock, including a receiver of any company. The Supreme Court has held, in the case of the United States v. Harris (177 U. S., 305), that existing law does not include the receiver of a railroad company. At the present time a certain railroad, now in the hands of a Federal receiver, is confining animals fifty and even sixty hours without food, rest, and water.

6. The statute should be amended to cover the transportation of animals from a State to a Territory or from a Territory to a State. The United States district court for the district of Kansas has held recently, in the case of the United States v. The St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company (an unreported case), that the law does not cover a shipment from a Territory to a State, the wording of the statute being, "* * * which transports live stock from one State to another."

Mr. ALDRICH. Do I understand that this measure permits cattle to be taken from one end of the country to the other without supervision?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Rhode Island evidently has something else in his mind.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have seen a great deal in the newspapers about supervision of cattle. I did not know whether these particular cattle would be permitted to go without supervision or whether there was some kind of supervision provided for.

Mr. WARREN. When we get into the zone of supervision and inspection, I dare say they will be properly supervised and inspected. The cattle here referred to are under the care of the owner of the stock or his agents, and we are seeking to prevent hardships to the stock by permitting the owner in cases where he can not make the landing in twenty-eight hours upon written request made to the transportation company to extend the time not beyond thirty-six hours.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I hope there are enough Senators here who are interested in dumb animals to prevent the passage of the pending bill. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] made a statement in regard to providing water and hay in the cars for cattle to eat and drink while in transit. I did not want to interrupt the Senator in his discourse, but I am sure, had I asked him the question, he would have been compelled to answer that he never saw cattle either drink or eat when they were in transit. He says the racks in the cars are full of hay. Of course they are, because the cattle never touch it.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want the Senator to proceed any further quoting me. I will say to him that I have at times for many years accompanied stock, and I have not only seen them eat hay, but invariably they eat it, much or little; very little, of course, while they are in motion. But they do eat. Those that are hungriest will eat while traveling. That is why the racks were put in and why they are filled up with hay.

Mr. SCOTT. I am glad indeed to know that the Senator has noticed in his experience with shipping stock that they will occasionally, when they become very hungry, eat a little bit of hay.

I am like the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I can not see that we are affording to these dumb creatures betterment of their condition when we extend the time from twenty-eight to thirty-six hours. We have now sufficient talk in the newspapers in regard to meats and the troubles we are having in that connection. I think any Senator who as a boy was raised upon a farm knows that cattle in the condition that they would be in after being kept on the cars for this extended time—in fact, for any length of time, as the Senator from Wyoming very well said—are unfit for food, and they ought not to be killed when they arrive at the point of destination nor until they have had time to be fed up and to get over the fevered condition in which they undoubtedly arrive at the point of destination.

Mr. President, I think that the best point we could make in a bill would be to insist that the cattle should be butchered at the point where they are bought and should be shipped east as dressed meat. Then of course you would avoid the cruelty to the live animals. But I could not sit still without voicing my sense of justice to these dumb animals, nor could I fail to enter my protest against extending the time in which cattle may be kept in cars.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I intended to ask to have read a letter, written by an Iowa gentleman to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], which the Senator sent to me with the request that I present it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

J. G. LINDON, LIVE STOCK AND LAND,
Clear Creek, Iowa, March 16, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In behalf of the live-stock shippers and feeders, I earnestly beg of you to use your utmost power as a Member of Congress from this district. Your constituents, one and all, are deeply interested, both from a financial and a humane standpoint, in having the twenty-eight-hour law extended to a thirty-six-hour limit that live stock shall remain in cars while in transit during this period of time. The present law works a great injustice to all concerned. It frequently happens that a railroad, in order to avoid breaking this law, will unload stock in small, muddy stock yards, without any place to feed and water, the stock huddled together in small yards, fighting and bruising each other and causing very heavy losses, and perhaps this unloading place is not over two or three hours' run to the destination. It is impossible for the railroads to provide ample feeding places without constructing such feeding places at every station on their lines, and that would cause an enormous expense to the railroad and would not benefit the shipper. I wish to say that this twenty-eight-hour law is an old law and entirely out of line under the present methods of shipping live stock. The railroads have very wisely constructed large, roomy cars, supplied with feed racks, which every shipper uses and provides his stock with plenty of feed while they are in transit. The railroads have also put the minimum weight on all live stock, except, perhaps, sheep, at a low minimum weight, which makes it very comfortable for the stock. I have frequently seen one-half of my cattle in transit lying down in the cars, resting as easily as they would in their feed lots at home. I know of no thing which is so important to the live-stock feeders and shippers in the State of Iowa, and farther west, as that this twenty-eight-hour law should be extended to a thirty-six-hour law.

I am, yours, truly, J. G. LINDON.

Mr. WARREN. I have a great many other letters, but I do not want to encumber the RECORD with them. I will say that this is one of a very great many others along the same line.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have had some letters explaining the financial advantage to shippers of live stock to the market which would result from the passage of the pending bill. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] did well to call attention to the harmony between the title of this bill and its provisions. According to the title it is a bill to prevent cruelty to animals—cruelty through carrying them without unloading for rest, food, and water; and I take it the rest is very important as well as the food and water. The letter which was just read presents a very pleasing picture which I can behold in imagination, but which I have never seen—cattle lying down in the cars happy and peaceful and restful, as if they were in their fields at home. I have hundreds of times seen carloads of cattle so jammed together and struggling with each other to keep on their feet, so crowded that they could not lie down, could not even be thrown down, that the man with any sort of humanity would despise the people responsible for it.

Mr. WARREN. May I say to the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; the Senator may.

Mr. WARREN. That the mode of shipping has been greatly changed in that respect very lately. Cattle are shipped by weight instead of per car. The shipment of cattle by weight gives many advantages. They have a great deal of room.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not question that——

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me for a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I want to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, in the line of what he has been saying, if he has not seen one of these poor dumb brutes get down, when the man in charge comes along with a prod at the end of a pole and compels him to get up?

Mr. SPOONER. No; I do not happen to remember to have seen that.

Mr. SCOTT. I have seen that many times.

Mr. SPOONER. I have seen horses and cattle in the course of transportation very tenderly cared for, with abundant accommodations and certainly excellent attention. But they were horses that were pets, or thoroughbred horses, for breeding purposes or otherwise, and the same as to cattle. So far as I can remember, I have not known that to be applicable to cattle that were shipped for slaughter, and I do not believe that cattle which are shipped to be butchered within a day or two days after they reach their destination are treated in the manner indicated by the Senator from Wyoming.

I am not a live stock man. The Senator knows more about it than I do because he is a live stock man among other things. He ships cattle to market. That is a part of his business, and it was more profitable a while ago than it is now.

But there are two phases of this subject, one the standpoint of humanity and the other the standpoint of the consumer, the general public interest. It is in the interest of the people who buy meat and eat meat, it is in the interest of the consumers of the country that live stock intended for the market, to be butchered and sold to the people for food, shall be humanely treated in transit, that they shall not be crowded as I have seen stock cars crowded, so that from the time the train starts until it reaches its destination it is a struggle between them all not for food or for water, but for life almost. It is important that they should be rested at proper times. It is important that they should be fed and that they should be watered.

The Senator from Wyoming says, demolishing the Senator from Massachusetts by way of admission, that eight hours is too long to keep cattle, for the good of the cattle, penned in a car.

Mr. WARREN. I said that eight minutes was too long.

Mr. SPOONER. I am going to get to that. He said that eight hours is too long; that it is detrimental to the animal; and the Senator said that eight minutes is too long. Of course they must be confined more than eight minutes or they could not be transported to market at all. They must be confined for eight hours, and for more than eight hours, or they could not be transported from the farm or the plains to the shambles. But the Senator's concession ought to lead Senators to stop and consider whether a bill which extends the time from twenty-eight hours to thirty-six hours ought to be entitled "A bill to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad."

Mr. WARREN. It is to the stockmen.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps it is to the stockmen, the men who ship wild cattle, not as you would ship a pet horse or a pet cow or a pet lamb, but cattle shipped to be sold and butchered.

We have had a law on the statute books for thirty-four years which this bill proposes to repeal. It was passed in 1873. It is the twenty-eight-hour law, and it required that cattle while in transit should not be confined within a car for more than five consecutive hours, "unless prevented from so unloading by storm or other accidental causes." Congress was careful to go on and say:

In estimating such confinement, the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest on connecting roads from which they are received shall be included.

This bill industriously provides that the time for loading and unloading, which is not a quiet time for cattle, shall be excluded from the thirty-six hours.

Now, there is a form, and it is only a form, of retaining the twenty-eight-hour limit in this bill. That is retained. There is a prohibition on their being confined "in cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a period longer than twenty-eight consecutive hours." Then follows this amendment, which does away with it all.

I suppose it was not thought wise to change the law by striking out "twenty-eight hours" and inserting "thirty-six hours." That would have been too brash. That would have brought the subject too strongly to the attention of humane people. But it is put in this qualified but none the less effective way, I take it:

Provided, That upon the written request of the owner or person in custody of that particular shipment, which written request shall be separate and apart from any printed bill of lading or other railroad form, the time of confinement may be extended to thirty-six hours.

Has the Senator much doubt that that request would accompany every shipment of live stock to market?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I take it, as the Senator has asked me that question, that he wishes me to reply.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator, with all the seriousness I am capable of commanding, that the bill has no such intention as he imputes to it, because the man with the stock will unload, not in twenty-eight hours, but in twenty or twenty-four hours if it is possible for him to get a proper place to unload and to handle the stock.

Exactly what this provision means is that, weighing the subject, he knows his cattle will suffer more to take them out where there are insufficient means of providing for them than to go on farther, and he will make this written order, and upon that he can proceed to market.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not, then, have it thirty-six hours and rely upon the selfishness and the humanity of the owner or the custodian accompanying the stock to take them out whenever it is needful in the interest of the cattle to do so?

Mr. WARREN. Notwithstanding the law has, as the Senators says, been upon the statute books all these years, practically that is exactly what has been done up to the last two years. The law has been almost a dead letter, because it is impracticable. For instance, if the Senator will permit me right there——

Mr. SPOONER. Why is it impracticable? That may be true as to sheep, perhaps, but why is it impracticable to take cattle out of a car in twenty-four hours and give them water and something to eat and a chance to stretch their limbs, as men do, and to rest themselves?

Mr. WARREN. I will suppose a case. You start for a point which you would make in twenty-six or twenty-seven hours ordinarily. There is not along that way, unless it is right at the start, a place where you can unload and get water suitably. You meet with some delay. Some accident occurs to the train and lays you up. You get within 50 or 100 miles of your destination. There has been no calculation whatever made at that point to unload the stock.

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator mean by "calculation?"

Mr. WARREN. There are no stock yards.

Mr. SPOONER. No facilities?

Mr. WARREN. You can not unload cattle on the ground. You must have stock yards, and those stock yards should have water, and the water has to be taken through pipes into troughs for them to drink. It is not like the pet horse and the pet cow.

I want to say to the Senator that with stock that is raised or fattened in small bunches there is no trouble, because that class of stock you can take out and ship or load on some movable platform, or get them to some livery stable and take care of them. But when there is a train load of twenty-five or thirty cars filled with cattle you can not so provide. As I said, the stockman is within 50 or 100 miles of his destination, where he can have his stock taken out and rest them, and they would be resting a day or two before they are slaughtered. If he is compelled to stop where he is or go back to some place——

Mr. SPOONER. I got my authority as to one or two days from the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. If he has to run back to some place and unload, he goes over twenty-eight hours. He must wait there, and the cattle will not rest and feed. Then he must again load them and get them to market after a delay of one, two, or three days, when the cattle are much more harassed and worse abused than if they had remained in the car two, three, or four additional hours.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me ask the Senator, Is it not true that the railway companies which carry live stock have by this time provided facilities for loading and unloading and yards for watering and feeding stock at least once in twenty-four hours?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; they have provided it. If you could be always on schedule time and never have an accident or delay in getting away or in loading and never have an accident en route, they have arranged yards so that you could in twenty-four and twenty-eight hours unload them at the proper places.

This bill is absolutely and honestly in the interest of humane treatment of the stock and in the interest of the consumer and of those who have to pay for and consume the meat, and is also in the interest of the owner. The fact that it is financially to his interest to have his stock arrive in good and proper condition is no reason why he should be barred out from consideration.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly not. Mr. President, the present law, which has been in force for thirty-four years——

Mr. WARREN. It has been enforced, if the Senator will pardon me, scarcely at all except within two years.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say enforced. I say in force.

Mr. WARREN. I beg pardon.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say enforced. There are a great many laws which have not been enforced that ought to have been enforced. I was about to say that this law, which has been in force for thirty-four years, was drafted with reference to the possibility that accidents might prevent strict obedience to it. It provides "unless prevented from so unloading by storm or other accidental causes."

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. At the time the law was passed more than one-half of the territory that now furnishes the beef—that is, you may say the wild cattle, was unoccupied by cattle, or there were very few there. The cattle did not have to be shipped the long distances that they travel now, and there was an entirely different equipment to handle them in the way of cars, etc.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, Mr. President, the Senator said there was no provision in the bill for inspection. There is something else in the present law that is not in this bill. Whether it endears the bill to anyone or not, I do not know.

Under the present law it is provided that—

Any company, owner, or custodian of such animals who knowingly and willingly fails to comply with the provisions of the two preceding sections—

As to unloading the stock and providing them with food and water and rest—shall, for every such failure, be liable for and forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $500. But when animals are carried in cars, boats, or other vessels in which they can and do have proper food, water, space, and opportunity to rest, the provisions in regard to their being unloaded shall not apply.

Then the act provides how the penalty shall be recovered; that it shall be in civil action in some circuit or district court of the United States.

This bill leaves out the owner or custodian from the penalty clause of the present law and puts it entirely upon the carrier, and that, too, notwithstanding the fact that under the law the carriage for thirty-six hours is upon the application of the owner or custodian. Why is that?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. SPOONER. Why is that?

Mr. WARREN. As to the penalty clause of the bill, it is that which the Department of Agriculture asks. If the Senator from Wisconsin thinks it is deficient, I have no objection to his offering any amendment which he thinks ought to cover the deficiency. The owner himself is not seeking to avoid any of the penalties that may properly be inflicted.

Mr. SPOONER. But the owner does avoid by this bill the penalty to which he was subject and has been for thirty-four years.

Mr. WARREN. I shall be glad to accept an amendment to cover it.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to know why it was left out of this bill. This bill was drawn with the Revised Statutes of the United States under the eye of the draftsman. It repeals by specific provision sections 4386, 4387, 4388, and 4389. It makes it the duty of the owner or custodian accompanying the stock to see to it that the stock are unloaded, rested, fed, and watered, but industriously it removes from the owner or custodian any penalty whatever for failing to obey the injunction of the law. Now, why is it omitted?

Mr. LODGE. Has the Senator noticed the reason given for it in the advisers of the Agricultural Department?

Mr. SPOONER. No; I have not seen the report.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I will read it.

Mr. SPOONER. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. LODGE (reading):

> 10. Section 3 of the present bill—a penalty section—is changed by exempting the owner or shipper of the live stock from the penalty for failure to unload for food, rest, and water. The present law, as construed by the Federal courts, imposes liability for this failure equally upon the shipper and the carrier. The shipper surrenders control of the live stock in a large measure to the carrier, and he is unable to unload the stock without the active cooperation of the carrier. Inasmuch as the carrier is assured payment for food furnished, it is thought the primary liability for failure to unload should be laid upon the carrier.

And therefore he is exempted from any liability whatever. I think that is one of the drollest statements of a reason that I ever read.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. SPOONER. The other day, when the anti-pass amendment was pending here, it was stated to the Senate by the Senator from Wyoming, accurately of course, that it would be a great hardship and wrong not to permit the railway carriers to give passes to the owner or his agent accompanying live-stock shipments; and the Senator stated, what was undoubtedly accurate, that the railroad corporations require the owner, or some representative of the owner, to accompany the shipments of live stock. He even argued that pro forma, so strict was the rule of the railway company, the owner or his representative became an employee in a sense of the carrier, and therefore he ought to be carried free.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Now, that being true, as I assume it to be true, I do not think the railway carriers would want to take the whole responsibility of looking after the stock. Why should the owner or the custodian be exempted from failure from penalty for not performing his humane duty under the statute?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator understood me to say that all the railroads required——

Mr. SPOONER. I did.

Mr. WARREN. As part of the shipment that the owner should accompany it, he misunderstood me. I did not say that. I said that it was customary for the roads to ask the shipper or his men to accompany the stock, and that on their failure they would have to put men themselves to accompany it; and I made the point that they would use men who were not accustomed to handling stock.

Mr. BAILEY. As a matter of fact, many railroads do require a man to accompany the shipments, and they have declined to receive them without a man in charge of them. The Senator from Wisconsin will permit me to say that it never happens in a case where a man is in charge of the stock that the conductor in charge of the train, having probably twenty cars, would permit the man in charge of one car of cattle to determine the movement of the train, and the conductor would stop that train and allow those cattle or horses to be fed and watered when he was ready.

It would be simply an outrage to punish a man for what he was absolutely powerless to prevent. I have known, and every man with any experience in the shipment of live stock has known, conductors to continue the shipment over the protest of the men in charge. In one instance that happened to come under my personal experience in a lawsuit against the railroad company for damages, they reached the stock yards knee deep in mud and the men in charge protested against unloading and feeding them there, but the railroad unloaded and fed the cattle. The men in charge are absolutely powerless to determine when or where this unloading and feeding shall take place; and it would therefore be a monstrous proposition to punish an American citizen for what was done against his will and over his protest.

Mr. SPOONER. It could not be done under the law.

Mr. BAILEY. It can be done, and is done every day under the law.

Mr. SPOONER. It could not be done under the law. I take it that if any owner accompanying the shipment of live stock or his representative was prevented from unloading the stock where water and feed would be afforded because the conductor of the train would not stop it, in a civil suit for a penalty under this statute the Senator does not think he would have the slightest difficulty in establishing a defense.

Mr. BAILEY. No; he need not have the slightest difficulty either in recovering from the railroad damages in that case, but it is hardly true that we want to force men to resort to the court where it is easy to obviate it.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that he can not find a man in America with any practical experience in the shipment of cattle who will not say that it is more humane to carry cattle on to market than it is to unload them, feed them, and reload them when they are within six or eight hours of the market.

Mr. SPOONER. That may be.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all this does.

Now, if the Senator will permit me to further interrupt him a moment.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. If the distance required sixty hours under the law as it stands, they must be unloaded and fed three times, because twenty-eight hours to each does not cover the shipment and the last load, and unloading must occur within four hours of the market. Everybody knows—I will not say everybody, because some very excellent gentlemen have no experience in that, however much they may know about other things—but every gentleman who has practical knowledge and experience in shipping cattle knows that it is incomparably better to let those cattle go on to the market than it is to unload them there within five or six hours of the market.

If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me to add one thing more. If a train reaches a feeding yard, the last one that will be reached within the time limited by the law, without regard to the condition of the weather and without regard to the condition of those pens, they must unload and feed, and yet it might happen that going on four or five hours they could find another stock pen free from the objection of the first, and any owner who was sane or any employee with intelligence enough to be trusted with a shipment of cattle would prefer to go on.

They do not obey that law, and the Agricultural Department is not trying to obey it, because it is unreasonable and works a hardship upon the men who ship cattle.

Mr. WARREN. The Secretary endeavored to apply the law and discovered what the Senator says.

Mr. BAILEY. I was about to say that something more than a year ago they did order this law enforced and they enforced it for a little while. While I have no knowledge that it is true, I have seen it stated in the public prints that the President himself directed the Secretary of Agriculture not to attempt the enforcement of this law until after the adjournment of this Congress. Of course I do not undertake to say where the President derived the power to authorize his subordinates to suspend the law of the land, but I have seen it stated in the public prints that he has done so; but whether authorized by the President or not, the Secretary of Agriculture is not to-day attempting to enforce the law. I am one of those who believe that when a law is so obviously unjust that honest men charged with the duty of its enforcement suspend it by a kind of common consent it is the wise thing for Congress to amend it until it is made reasonable, and then compel everybody charged with the duty of administering it to enforce it.

Mr. SPOONER. I confess my inability to cope with Senators who raise stock and who are familiar with this business. I do not claim to know very much about many subjects, and in that respect I differ from a good many. I differ from more, however, who think they know everything about every subject.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I do not apply that to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Inasmuch as it came so nearly after I resumed my seat, I felt justified in asking the Senator if he did intend to apply it to me.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I withdraw it, if the Senator takes it as offensive to himself.

Mr. BAILEY. If it does not apply to me, of course it is not offensive. It would be offensive if intended to apply to me, and I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin is generally more cautious and always fairer than that.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not a question of caution. It is a question of courtesy and justice.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, the frankest man does not always say what he thinks, because there are times and places in which it would be proper to say a given thing, and there are times and places in which it would not be proper to say the same thing; and therefore a man might be cautious about what he said, looking to the time and place. However, that does not arise here. The Senator from Wisconsin says he does not intend a reference to me, and I am entirely satisfied.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator made an observation which might have applied to me, but I did not think he meant it personally. That is all there is about that.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I did have in mind the Senator from Wisconsin when I referred to Senators who knew so much about other things, but who had no practical experience in this matter; and the Senator from Wisconsin should not be offended at that, because——

Mr. SPOONER. I admitted when I began to speak that I have not had experience as a shipper of stock.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly; and I want to say that that was my excuse for differing from that Senator and others. I did believe that this was one of the very unimportant questions about which my experience might be worth at least consideration, and I did have the Senator from Wisconsin in my mind as well as other Senators.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator need not have said that I know nothing about this subject, because I know something about it. I do not claim to know much about it. I know that cattle need water; I know they need rest; I know they need food, and I know that I have seen them in the course of transportation hundreds of times under circumstances which were absolutely brutal and merciless. I know that much about it.

Mr. BAILEY. Any man of the Senator's intelligence would know that in a general way, of course. I did not say he had no knowledge of the subject, but I said he had no practical experience.

Mr. SPOONER. To that I agree.

Mr. President, a great many of these cattle are carried hundreds of miles. They are carried from Idaho; they are carried from Montana; they are carried from Texas. I suppose it rarely happens that they stop within six hours of the point of destination for water and for feeding.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. There are points in Texas where a thirty-six-hour permission would carry the cattle from the point of shipment to the point of destination, to Kansas City and to St. Louis; but under the law as it stands I doubt if there is a single shipping point in the State that can come within the twenty-eight-hour limit.

I have talked with many of our cattlemen, and I have never talked with one—and they are men of intelligence, men of humanity as a rule, and they would not want the privilege of mistreating their cattle—I have never talked with one who was not in favor of this amendment to the law.

Mr. SPOONER. I take it under this proposed law that they could carry cattle thirty-six hours without stopping to water. I do not think it needs the cattle raiser or a man of experience to see that that is cruel—absolutely cruel. Think of it a minute! Put cattle into a car and transport them thirty-six hours without water, without food, and without rest!

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator indulge me while I offer him another evidence of my full information on this subject?

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator has great information on this subject.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that on the ranges, where the cattle are not fed at all, they sometimes go thirty-six hours without water.

Mr. SPOONER. I know; but it is cruel.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, it is a cruelty which they put on themselves. They know where the water is. In the southern part of our State, which for years was a dry country—it is not nearly so dry now as it was then—on the great ranches there, they would probably on 100,000 acres not have over three or four watering places, and ranchmen of long experience have told me, where they herded their cattle even before the land was fenced, that many times cattle would go thirty-six hours, when turned loose on the prairie, without going to water.

Mr. SPOONER. But they can lie down.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. And then they feed on grass, and consequently do not need so much water.

Mr. BAILEY. And sometimes when the grass was good they watered less frequently.

Mr. SPOONER. Showing that they would rather eat than drink.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not so sure that if I had to do without either on the cattle ranches, I had rather go without grass than without water; but both are absolutely necessary for the thrifty condition of a cow; and yet I have seen, as have the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Utah, the prairies at certain times so burned and crisp that it did not seem that anything could exist there; and yet the cattle lived. Men who know about their habits know that it is not necessarily cruelty to keep them without feed or water for thirty-six hours, because they go without of their own accord for even a longer time. I have heard men say that they would go sometimes forty-eight hours without water.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, really, there is no argument in that, for the reason that conditions are so utterly different. In that case they are free; they can run around; they can go where they please; they can lie down; they can feed, and they may go without water; but, Mr. President, to pack them in a car so that they can not lie down, and to carry them thirty-six hours without feed and without water may seem more humane—that is the object of this bill, because the title says so—than to carry them eight hours less, packed like sardines, unable to lie down, without water and without feed. I have not had enough experience in this business to know whether it is more cruel or less cruel, but I think it more cruel.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator begs the question. Of course it depends altogether on the conditions whether it is more cruel to keep them on the cars for a longer time. As an illustration, it might be more painful for the moment to have a tooth extracted by a couple of twists than to have it extracted by one twist; but if it were necessary that it should be extracted and it took two twists to extract it, I presume the Senator would prefer that the two twists should be made in succession rather than wait until another day to suffer the second shock. So it is more humane that the cattle should sometimes remain for a few hours longer on the cars rather than suffer an extra unloading and reloading.

Mr. SPOONER. The tooth argument is a very powerful one, no doubt, but that is a thing that has to be done; and when it is done and past recall, that is the end and the pain is gone.

Mr. WARREN. The sooner it is over the better.

Mr. SPOONER. But in this case it does not hurt the owner as much as it does the stock.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] was perhaps correct in saying that the beef ought to be slaughtered nearer where raised, and be shipped and disposed of in quarters; but I am afraid in that case we should have a good many musty quarters, when shipped thousands of miles.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not want to take any more time upon this bill. If the Senate thinks this time should be extended, as a matter of humanity, from twenty-eight hours, during which the cattle need to be fed and watered, and that thirty-six hours, if they think it in the interest of the consumer, if they think it decent treatment of dumb brutes, they will pass this bill.

Mr. CARTER obtained the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin rather complains that these cattle are packed in a car, as he describes it, like sardines in a box. He would know on a moment's reflection that in shipping wild cattle if you do not put them too close to fight you would hardly have a live one when you reached the market. That is because of the rather ferocious disposition of the cow that comes from the plains or the large ranches. And, moreover, unless we could get very much lower railroad rates than any of us hope for, the freight bill would absorb what little profit is now left to the farmer or cattle grower if we should ship fewer to the car. We must tax the capacity of the car in most parts of the country to the utmost in order to get our cattle to the market at a reasonable cost.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BAILEY. I will.

Mr. SCOTT. Then, on the line of the Senator's argument, it is necessary to punish these poor dumb brutes in order that their owner may make more money out of the transaction when they arrive at the market by crowding them into the car in order to save freight.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from West Virginia was not attending to what I said at first. What I said at first was that if these cattle were not loaded close enough to prevent it they would injure each other very much more with their horns than the crowding in the car could possibly injure them. So as a matter of humanity——

Mr. SCOTT. And of economy.

Mr. BAILEY. It was required that we should load them closely. The Senator from West Virginia forgets and the Senator from Wisconsin also forgets that one of the very purposes of requiring an attendant in charge of these cattle is that at every stop, or at proper intervals, he will go along the car and if there is a cow down he will help it up. That is a part of the duty of such attendants, and the railroad, if it is carefully managed, will see to it that this duty is properly performed. Settling with the Senator from Wisconsin that question of humanity, I then made the other suggestion, which, of course, appeals to the owners' pocketbook.

Mr. President, I confess a very great sympathy with and a very sincere attachment to the men who grow cattle upon the plains and on the ranches of this country. As a rule, they are high-minded men; as a rule, they are more sincerely attached to God's dumb creatures than are the men who compose many of these organizations that would have us believe the cattle raisers are ruffians. They are men who do their duty to their country fearlessly and well, both in peace and in war; and I do not count it as any just subject of criticism against me because I look to the question of their profit, after I have first settled with my conscience and my judgment the question of humane treatment for these animals.

Many of these men year after year endured the hardships of that great country beyond the comforts and conveniences of our civilization. True, they have waited there, after having been pioneers, until civilization has overtaken them; but none of its evil tendencies have yet infected them, and I undertake to say that there are few cattle growers either in the great West or in the great Southwest that would not ride farther and faster to save a cow from suffering than many of these folk who think it is their duty to continually interfere with other people's business. Of course, the Senator from West Virginia will understand, when I make that statement, I have no reference to him or to any other Senator, because it is the duty of Senators to see that whatever legislation passes this body is wise and proper. That description I only intend to fit people who are always writing and telegraphing Members of Congress how we ought to perform our duties, no matter what the question is. Even in reference to the right of a Senator in this body to hold his seat, I have received within the last thirty days 500 telegrams from people who have never read or heard the testimony, and who do not know a syllable of the law which must govern the case.

Mr. SPOONER. About what?

Mr. BAILEY. A question involving the right of a member of this body to his seat. A few days ago, when the conferees of one body forced upon the conferees of this body an unjust anti-pass provision, Senators day after day stood here presenting hundreds of telegrams. Those who sent the telegrams had a right to appeal to us. They were immediately interested, and all they said was entitled to respectful consideration. I gave them respectful consideration in that instance, because they knew what they were talking about, and what they were talking about then came very close to their homes and involved a part of what may be fairly considered their compensation. But as to the testimony, the protests, and the criticisms against this legislation, I respectfully submit that it comes from worthy people who have absolutely no practical knowledge of this subject. From every source possessed of practical knowledge, from the Secretary of Agriculture himself, through all of his subordinates, whose duty it has been to administer this law, down to every cattleman in the land, it is insisted that the present law is a hardship, and that they are fairly entitled to the amendment which is proposed to be made by the pending bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator thinks that thirty-six hours, as a rule, is a fair limit, as I understand?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I was going to follow that, if he says "Yes," by asking, Why, then, should it be left optional with the shipper?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator, of course, observed that I did not answer that I think thirty-six hours under all circumstances——

Mr. SPOONER. As a rule.

Mr. BAILEY. Is a proper rule; and this amendment does not make it the rule under all circumstances.

Mr. WARREN. It makes it the exception.

Mr. BAILEY. This bill leaves twenty-eight hours, as stipulated in the present law, the rule, and only provides for an exception where the owner asks for it.

Mr. SPOONER. They will generally ask for it.

Mr. BAILEY. No. I am free to say if the owner were within two or three hours of the market he would probably go on, even if he felt the cattle would suffer. I ought not to say "the owner;" I ought to have said "some owners." I believe the majority of the men who grow cattle in this country would unload them whenever they felt the dictate of humanity intervened; but surely the Senator from Wisconsin will agree that it is more humane to take the cattle thirty-two hours and at last unload them in a dry yard, with fair weather, than it would be to unload them at the end of twenty-eight hours in a muddy yard and in a storm.

Mr. SPOONER. But this applies to journeys which will take sixty or seventy or eighty or even ninety hours, and on such trips the stock would not have to be unloaded except at thirty-six-hour periods.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes. What would happen in that case? If they started from a point in Wyoming to reach Chicago, they would take the average running time and they would divide it so as to feed according to that time; and if by going thirty-six hours they could save themselves unloading and reloading over three times, they would do so. Suppose the running time were eighty-five hours, then under the present law they would have to unload and reload four times, because three times twenty-eight would be eighty-four, and although the cattle would be only an hour or more on the cars, if the law were obeyed they would be compelled to unload again. In a case of that kind, under the pending bill, they would simply divide the travel so as to unload and reload most conveniently; in other words, this bill only allows an elasticity and a play of judgment, which may do a great deal of good, and which, in my opinion, can do no harm.

Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator from Montana. I only intended to say a word when I took the floor.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Texas has occupied the time very efficiently, I think, Mr. President. I wish to submit but a few observations on the pending bill. Quite unhappily, I think, the assumption is indulged that the stock owner or shipper desires this extension of time to the end that he may, under all circumstances and conditions, keep the stock in the cars for the full maximum limit here fixed. That, as I understand, is not the purpose of the bill at all.

The present law was passed thirty-four years ago, and many of the railroads largely engaged in transporting live stock, particularly from beyond the Mississippi, have, during the years while the law has been in force, made their arrangements for stock yards and feeding places along their respective lines. Through accident or unavoidable delay it occasionally happens that the twenty-eight-hour limit interferes to such an extent as to necessitate an extra loading and unloading along a given line or route. Let me illustrate. If, perchance, a train is two hours late coming from Montana into Fargo, N. Dak., the train must be unloaded there instead of being sent on to the stock yards at St. Paul; whereas, if the train entered Fargo strictly on time, the St. Paul stock yards would be made within the twenty-eight-hour limit.

Those familiar with the handling of live stock well know that it is a very difficult task to unload and reload a train of cattle. It is desirable that the unloading and reloading be limited, as far as practicable, without, of course, invading the humanitarian idea. The stock owners are as anxious as anyone to preserve the cattle in the best possible physical condition for entry into the market. They not only have the humanitarian purpose or impulse, but they have likewise the financial stimulus which generally constrains men to look well to the conditions which yield profit or result in loss.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that be so, what is the need of a law at all? If the men transporting cattle are so humanitarian in their impulses and they want to get the stock to the market in the best possible condition, why does Congress intervene to put a law on the statute book upon this subject? There must have been some abuses.

Mr. CARTER. I have no doubt to-day that if no limitation existed, self-interest and sentiments of humanity would secure as good results as can be or have ever been secured under the law. It is known to all people who ship live stock, particularly from the ranges, that the loading and unloading is a serious detriment to the stock.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, if the Senator from Montana will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. The twenty-eight-hour law was passed, as I recall, for two purposes—to yield to those representing humane societies who desired to make provision for better protection of live stock, and to act as a check upon the railroads, so that the stock shipper, for himself and for his stock, would have some support from the law in the matter of exacting hours of the railroads.

Let me say, further, that twenty-eight hours, with the equipment they then had, with no hayracks, water troughs, or air brakes, was a longer time, measured by the suffering of the stock, than forty hours would be now with the present equipment.

Mr. CARTER. I was about to touch upon that particular point. The Senator from Wyoming very clearly, I think, indicates one of the purposes in the enactment of the twenty-eight-hour limitation. It was the fact undoubtedly before the passage of that law that the stock shipper was wholly subject to the command of the train dispatcher. If the conductor received an order to stop only at a certain terminal point, a long distance ahead, the guardian of the stock, the owner, or person in charge was utterly powerless to compel a stop at any point nearer than that designated in the order. So that the twenty-eight-hour limit gave to the stock owner the right, with the law behind him, to command the railroad company to stop at a given point within the limit of time specified.

The Senator from Wyoming also wisely suggests that the equipment of thirty-four years ago made the twenty-eight-hour trip over a railroad more difficult and burdensome than twice that distance to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. It did not lengthen the hours, did it?

Mr. CARTER. It did not lengthen the hours, but it certainly diminished the burden and weariness of travel, both for stock and for human beings. I well remember that twenty-eight years ago in the State of Illinois they had the old chair joints for the railroads, with soft roadbeds, and travel upon a train was not unlike going over a corduroy road in a lumber wagon. The box cars were ill-constructed, the springs ill-suited, and the brakes were turned by a wheel. When the train was stopped there was a great commotion, and a mighty jar between every car. The tendency was to throw the stock down, and passengers were compelled to hold onto the seats as they passed through a train in motion.

Since that time, Mr. President, we have reached the continuous steel rail and more thoroughly settled roadbeds. Instead of the little 30, 35, and 40 pound iron rail of thirty-four years ago we have the 60, 70, 80, and even 90 pounds steel rails of to-day. Thirty-four years ago it would have been impossible to have operated a dining car upon any passenger train in the United States. You could not have kept the tableware on the table. A man would have jabbed himself in the face with his fork trying to guide food into his mouth. The railroad of thirty-four years ago no more compared with the railroad and the equipment of the railroad of to-day than a stagecoach practically of twenty years prior to that compared with the old-time railroad.

Mr. President, while the road has been improved with the heavy steel rail and a substantial roadbed, we have also the modern equipment. Instead of brakemen running up and down the train at the peril of their lives setting brakes we have the air brake, so that the long stock trains are stopped with practically as little friction or jar as obtains in the case of an ordinary passenger train. The stock is not disturbed in shipment. The cars are higher and better ventilated. They are heavier and consequently less inclined to jolt about even if the tracks were as bad as of yore. To carry cattle for twenty-eight hours on a train thirty-four years ago was an act of cruelty compared with the carrying of a like shipment for thirty-six hours to-day.

But it is not the purpose to carry the cattle for thirty-six continuous hours. This bill is intended to meet a contingency which will arise now and then, and of that contingency the owner will be the judge, the man who has an interest in maintaining the condition of the stock the best possible under all the circumstances. If twenty-eight hours constituted a proper limitation thirty-four years ago, fifty-six hours would not be an excessive limit now. But, as I have suggested, the stock yards are built to accommodate the twenty-eight-hour run. The thirty-six-hour limit will be put into operation in the main under circumstances where the man in charge of the stock finds that he will run over twenty-eight hours by one, two, three, or four hours if he continues to the next feeding place, and having determined that this excess of time on the cars will prove less injurious, if you please, than to unload them twice instead of once, the order will be given.

I am quite sure, as the Senator from Texas well says, that the men who raise the cattle, who are interested in them, will be constrained by their financial interest, as well as the general interest every man has in his own property and business, to be at all times as humane as any outsider or person having no interest could possibly be; but if the man is conceded to lack humane principles, it will not be doubted that owners, in the main, want to make a profit instead of being compelled to encounter a loss. Enlightened self-interest, if not principles of humanity, will impel the owner to consider well the conditions under which the value of his property will be depreciated.

A single unnecessary unloading of stock in transit seriously impairs the weight and value of the stock. The owner is interested in having the stock placed upon the market in as good condition as possible. This bill will permit him to exercise some discretion when a contingency arises on the question of unloading or going on for a few hours longer, in order to avoid the extra punishment to the stock always inseparable from unloading and putting them back into the cars.

The Senator from Minnesota suggests to me the propriety of a further explanation of the method of getting stock into St. Paul. I wish to say that the St. Paul yards are probably the best stock yards in all the northwestern country. All of the stock raised between the Mississippi River and the State of Washington, or practically the Pacific Ocean, passes through the St. Paul stock yards. They have in those yards splendid facilities for unloading, for feeding, and for protecting the stock. It is impracticable to pass through St. Paul without unloading. All the railroads have arranged for St. Paul as one of the central and regular feeding and watering stations for stock.

Now, we will assume that because of a breakdown or some accident to some other train a stock train has been delayed three or four hours. It reaches Fargo, N. Dak., four hours late. If it had passed Fargo on time it would have reached St. Paul within the twenty-eight-hour limit, but being delayed in the course of the run it reaches the town of Fargo at such a time that it is manifest that, in the normal course of the schedule run, it will get to St. Paul after the twenty-eight-hour limit has expired. That necessitates an unloading at Fargo, in order to avoid this extra run of two or three or four hours to get into the stock yards at St. Paul. The unloading at Fargo will prove infinitely more injurious to the cattle than to run them the extra four hours beyond the twenty-eight-hour limit, and thus avoid one unloading and loading at Fargo. Under present conditions they must stop at Fargo, because there is no place on the line between Fargo and St. Paul where they can unload the cattle and feed them.

The stock owners have sought this bill not because they want to ship cattle continuously for thirty-six hours, but because they desire to avoid the consequences of accident and delay along the road and the difficulties that result from such accidents and being compelled to interject into the shipment of cattle in transit an extra and unnecessary unloading along the line.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the description given by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] of the great advancement in railroad comforts is undoubtedly true. But even with all the comforts we have to-day in the parlor car, I am sure the Senator from Montana would dislike very much to be crowded into such a car, so that he would have to stand even twenty-eight hours, to say nothing about thirty-six hours, notwithstanding the fact that he would have the hundred-pound rails and the improved joint and couplings.

In all probability those of us who are taking the part of the dumb animals are going to be defeated when a vote on this bill is taken. The poor, dumb brute has not a vote. No man has a higher opinion, no man thinks more of the farmer who earns his bread in the sweat of his brow than I do. I was reared a poor boy, and drove an ox team when I was 16 years of age from Leavenworth to where the great city of Denver now stands, when there was not a house in it. My greatest friend at that time was my near-side ox. He knew where to go to lie down for the best shelter at night. He knew which way the wind was going to blow, and he lay with his back against the wind, and I moved in close to him to get a comfortable night's rest when I was herding.

I do not want the Senator from Texas to say that those of us who live in the East, surrounded, as he says, by luxuries, know nothing of the hardships of the cattlemen or those who live on the farm. I desire to say that I know all about it. I came up through tribulations. I am proud that we have organizations in this country which are doing all they can to prevent cruelty to dumb animals. As I started out to say, the gentlemen who are advocating this bill to-day are not advocating it because they believe it will be more just, more humane to the poor dumb brutes to confine them thirty-six hours in place of twenty-eight, but they are advocating it because of a constituency who want them to provide a means by which they may save something in the shipment of their cattle.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. The truth of it is that they are objecting to the amount they have to pay for feed, as I could prove if I had the time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator will excuse me. I am on a conference committee, and shall have to go out of the Chamber.

Mr. WARREN. I did not care to have the Senator proceed with the statement that those who are advocating this bill are not doing it in the cause of humanity. I deny that statement. They are doing it in the cause of humanity.

Mr. SCOTT. I am glad to hear the Senator say so, but if he can point out to any man who is open to conviction where it is more humane to a dumb brute to keep it confined where it can neither eat or drink, where it is compelled to stand in one position, or, in other words, where it must brace itself, so as to avoid being thrown down, thirty-six hours instead of adhering to the present law of twenty-eight hours, I will gladly concede that I have made a mistake in opposing this bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, if I felt that I might, I would conclude that the view which those who oppose this measure take of the manner of handling stock in transit is that whenever the twenty-eight hours expire, wherever the train may be, there the cattle are unloaded and fed and watered and rested. But anybody who has any knowledge whatever of the transportation of cattle from the ranges to the market knows that that is utterly impossible. To unload the cattle taken from the range and en route to the market there must be facilities. There must be pens, cattle chutes, water, and feeding racks, and those facilities, from the very nature of the pursuit, can only be at stated intervals, to be determined by the railway company.

When the law was first passed the railway companies undertook to meet the requirements of the law by establishing feeding and watering places at what the companies supposed were proper places. It was found impracticable to enforce the law as it was when it was first enacted, and that is the reason why the law remained entirely unenforced until the effort made of late years, and for very largely the same reasons the effort to enforce the law has been largely abandoned, because latitude is given by the Secretary of Agriculture and his agents to omit to observe the law where the necessities of the occasion require it.

Now, take feeding and watering stations at intervals along the different lines of railway. How can the cattle owner accompanying his cattle regulate the speed of the train or avoid the delays incident to all railway trains? It may be that an accident has blocked the train conveying the cattle. It may be that some neglect of duty on the part of the engineer or conductor of a passenger train has made it necessary to sidetrack the train composed either in whole of cattle cars or of which cattle cars constitute a part. With what result? That it is impossible to reach the feeding and watering place within the twenty-eight-hour limit, and then those in charge of the train are confronted with this condition: They must either violate the law, run the risk of being prosecuted and heavily fined, or attempt to unload the stock where there are no facilities; and in every instance they must be impaled upon the first horn of the dilemma, because it is a physical impossibility to unload cattle such as are transported from the grazing plains of the great Middle West to the meat markets of the East in the absence of proper facilities.

Therefore it was found necessary, if the law was to be observed, that some latitude should be given—a latitude within which there might be no reasonable excuse to evade the very letter as well as the spirit of the law. It is this latitude which is contained in the pending bill—a latitude of eight hours—so that in the event the cattle train should be delayed so that it could not reach the pens and the place for food and water the train may continue on its course, it may be for two or three or four or five hours, until the proper facilities are reached, without either the railway company or the owner of the cattle being chargeable with a violation of the statute.

Then, as has been repeatedly said by those who have spoken upon this subject, it is not infrequently the case that cattle trains could reach their point of destination within a very few hours after the twenty-eight-hour limit has expired. Suppose the destination is Chicago, and two hours more would take the stock into the yards at Chicago; or, taking St. Louis, that three or four more hours would take the train into the St. Louis yards. Is it not the height of absurdity as well as unnecessary cruelty to require that those cattle shall be unloaded, allowed to remain off the cars but for the period of five hours, and then forced again into the cars?

Mr. President, whoever has seen trains of western cattle—the broad-horned Texas steer and cow, and those that are upon the plains of the West to-day are nearly all either of that character or very closely allied; wild by nature, unruly in disposition, resenting control in close quarters—whoever has seen attempts to load and unload trains with this character of animals must realize that it is not an easy task, and that it is never accomplished without the greatest difficulty and a large amount of injury to the animals themselves. They resist, they balk, they attempt to evade the chute; they have to be driven up or driven down, many times by the use of violence, and when they reach the earth from the cars or the cars back again from the earth a very great amount of exhaustion has ensued as the result. With heated blood and nerves excited, if we can speak in that way of the nerves of a lot of cattle, they reach the market, when with but three or four hours more travel they would reach the market in a far better condition.

As the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Montana well said, the owners of cattle ought to be fairly presumed to desire so to handle their cattle, quite independently of the question of humanity, as that they will reap the largest results, and if it would yield greater profit to them to unload their cattle every twenty-eight hours they would do so, because self-interest would require them to do so. But having realized that frequent loading and unloading, not by reason of the cost, but by reason of the injury done to the cattle, is injurious to the cattle and injurious to the pockets of the owners, they have sought to have the limit enlarged in the way this bill proposes.

Mr. President, as I understand, this is simply intended to give to the owners of cattle a reasonable leeway in the transportation of their cattle from the prairie to the market, to enable them to cover every reasonable contingency, to enable them in the exercise of a sound judgment so to handle their cattle that there shall be the least injury done to the cattle and thereby the least injury done to themselves. And eight hours, even though they follow after twenty-eight hours, is not for cattle such a period of time. I am quite astonished that those who oppose measures of this kind do not insist that cattle should not be killed; that it is cruelty to animals and inhumane to slaughter them for human food. The next best thing they can do, I suppose, is to insist that the cattle shall be brought to market in as comfortable a condition as possible. It may be that they will insist that they shall have palace cattle cars; and indeed when some of the cars that are now provided for the transportation of cattle are compared with the cars of twenty or twenty-five or thirty years ago, they may well be called palace cattle cars.

Mr. President, the cattle are fed in transitu, and as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has said, cattle feed in transitu. So they are not without food. All the food they require to appease their hunger in transitu is placed in the cars that carry them, and with food to eat, the desire for water is largely modified, and the fatigue from standing is also thereby largely modified.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the men who are most deeply concerned in the welfare of the cattle are those who should be most largely consulted in determining the matter of transportation. Their concern is not that of humanity, I am willing to admit; it is that of profit; but experience has taught cattlemen as well as others that the profit consists in getting their cattle to market in the speediest possible time and in the best possible condition, and cattle can not be gotten to market in as good condition if inhumanity occurs in the handling of the cattle, and therefore the promptings of humanity are identical with the promptings of self-interest, and both require that cattle shall be gotten to their destination in the best possible form. If the men whose pockets are involved, whose financial interests depend on the outcome, insist that it will best serve their interests, because it means to them larger profits to give to them this leeway, I insist that they are far more likely to be right than the theorists who have made up their minds that twenty-eight hours is the limit of endurance, and that a minute or an hour beyond that time places the transaction within the boundaries of inhumanity.

There is nothing in this amendment that should not be incorporated in it, even the provision as to the parties to be responsible for a violation of the law. I think it was but common justice that the owner of the cattle should be eliminated from the equation, because the owner of the cattle has nothing whatever to do with the running of the train or the getting of the trains on time at the yards provided by the railway companies for unloading and feeding and watering stock.

The law, as it will stand, will declare that twenty-eight hours is the limit, practically saying that an emergency must exist, and when the emergency exists then the twenty-eight hours must be observed unless the owner or the person in charge of the cattle on the train shall in writing request that the time be extended. I think the Senate ought to have enough confidence in the character of the men so eloquently described by the Senator from Texas as to feel that they would not use the amendment that is asked for inhuman or horrible purposes.

Therefore, Mr. President, representing, as I do, a large constituency who are engaged in the cattle business, and having some practical knowledge, by observation more than otherwise, I have no hesitation in saying, and in giving it as my deliberate judgment, that the amendment which is proposed is one that should be enacted for the cause of humanity as well as for that degree of protection that the men engaged in this great industry are entitled to have at the hands of the lawmaking power.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is not a new question. The law has been on the statute-book a good many years. But there have been various efforts made to amend the law. Heretofore the advocate of amended legislation has insisted that forty hours was not an excessive time, and we have had several bills before Congress extending the time from twenty-eight to forty hours. But those bills did not receive the favor of the Congress.

If I remember correctly, those bills did not provide, as is done in this bill, that the extension of time should be upon the written request of the owner or the person in charge of the stock, but they boldy asked Congress—and they then made the same plea that it was in the interest of humanity—that the time should be extended from twenty-eight to forty hours. Failing to get that, they have come now asking us to extend the time to thirty-six hours.

Mr. President, some weeks, and possibly some months, ago I was interviewed by certain parties interested in the passage of this bill. One of them was from my own State—a man whose father had been a long-time personal and political friend of mine. I listened to them very attentively and was impressed with their arguments. It seemed to me there was something in the contention, and I said to them, without making any promise one way or the other, that I would give the matter very careful and conscientious consideration.

I have examined the bill. I have examined the literature on the subject. I have read the arguments of those who are in favor of the bill, and I have likewise, as I am always glad to do, read the representations of those who represent the humane societies of the country, and I do not propose to admit mildly and dumbly that the criticisms upon that class of people made to-day are founded in justice. We would have much less healthy legislation, State and national, if it were not for the people who take an interest in the welfare not only of the dumb beasts, but of the human kind as well; and I am glad that there are men and women all over our country who are taking an interest in this legislation and all similar legislation, and in a proper way presenting their views to those of us who are to cast our votes.

After giving the matter very careful consideration, I have concluded that in an excess of caution, if nothing else, it is my duty to vote against the pending bill. I presume it will pass the Senate, but I prefer that my vote shall be recorded against it rather than it shall be recorded in its favor.

We have heard eloquent arguments to-day to the effect that the men who ship cattle want to get them to market in the best possible condition, and that self-interest prompts them to ask for legislation along proper lines. That may be so, and yet there are some things which lead me to doubt it.

I have been told that this bill originated in the Department of Agriculture. I do not know whether it did or not. If it did——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me, it originated, so far as the calling of a preliminary meeting was concerned, with the stockmen and live-stock growers.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Secretary of Agriculture certainly has been brought into the discussion as being an advocate of this legislation.

Mr. WARREN. I am coming to that. The stockmen desired, as they always do, to obey the laws. The Department of Agriculture, in the last year or two, has attempted to apply and enforce this law—to take it from the dead-letter condition in which it slept for years and apply it. Its officials found, as everybody has found who has watched the shipment of stock, that the present law is not practical and not in the interest of the purchasers or consumers of meat and not conducive to the arrival at market of meat in the best condition.

The stockmen came to Washington and consulted with the Secretary of Agriculture and presented their views. I would not like to put it upon the Secretary of Agriculture that the bill was his and as coming from that Department as a command upon this Congress, but I do say it has the full approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and those in his Department who have been engaged in the last two years in an endeavor to enforce the twenty-eight-hour law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, wherever the bill may have originated, one provision was incorporated in the bill in its original draft that the committee has eliminated, which, it strikes me, was in the interest of humanity. That will be found in section 5, where it is provided:

> That it shall be the duty of every railroad, express company, car company, and of every common carrier other than by water, and of the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, wholly or in part engaged in the transportation of live stock by railroad from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, to transport said live stock so by it or him being transported with due diligence, and to maintain in all trains containing ten or more cars of live stock which is being transported from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia an average minimum rate of speed of not less than 16 miles per hour from the time any such live stock is loaded upon or into its or his cars, and made part of said train, until such train reaches its destination, or junction point for delivery to another carrier, deducting only in the computation of such average minimum speed such reasonable time as the live stock may be necessarily delayed in unloading to feed, water, and rest, and in feeding, watering, and resting, and in reloading, and such time as the live stock may be delayed by storm or by other accidental causes which can not be anticipated or avoided by the exercise of due diligence and foresight.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. We have listened to a picture to-day painted as to the difference between the condition of the railroads of the country when this original law was enacted and the condition to-day. I take it that whatever the speed of trains may have been twenty or thirty years ago, 16 miles at the present time as a minimum speed for a stock train is not excessive speed; and I will ask the Senator from Wyoming why it was that that provision was taken from the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the sixteen-hour limit is far too low for most railroads; it is too high for others. For instance, upon the main lines the full trains of cattle are supposed to move at nearer 25 and even 30 miles an hour than 16. In the meantime the little branch railroad lines or feeders that come in from the plains or from the mountains and join the main line are of lighter rail, of poorer construction, sometimes with a soft track, and it is at times unsafe to move over those feeder railroad lines at perhaps faster than 10 or 12 miles with live stock, but when they get upon the main line they make speed. It seemed to those interested in this bill as if it carried more of a license to railroads to reduce their speed on the main lines to 16 miles an hour than anything else, and it would not conduce to faster running time.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, it would not be to the interest of any railroad corporation to run at a less speed than could readily be made with a load of cattle. There is surely no danger of a railroad doing that.

Mr. WARREN. Now, the Senator has answered his own inquiry. It is not in the interest of railroads to run slow when they could run fast. They should and will run 20 or 25 miles an hour, and even more.

There is no necessity of having a limit in the bill. That limit was put in as a concession to members of the Humane Society of Washington who, as I am informed, stated that they would support the bill, or not oppose it, with that speed limit in, but when it was put in they nevertheless opposed the bill. It was, in my opinion, put in there as a concession, and not because it really added anything useful to the bill. I think it detracted from it, because it bound up the railroads upon the short lines, where they could not possibly make the time, and it seemingly gave the liberty on the main lines where neither their interest nor the interest of the stockmen require them to make as slow time as that.

I will say as to the main lines across the country, most of those shipping will average probably 25 miles an hour with stock trains. Of course freight trains can not move with the same regularity and can not depend upon making time every day as can passenger trains.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in reading the bill my attention was attracted to that, and I thought I should like to hear an explanation of it. I submit it for what it is worth.

Now, Mr. President, I am one of those who make no pretension of knowing very much about the transportation of cattle, but I have seen a great many loads of cattle in transit and I have seen a great many cars of cattle unloaded at their destination. I want to say that from the slight observation I have made if there is any way that human intelligence and human ingenuity can devise to lessen the suffering of cattle transported from the far West to the markets at Chicago and other cities of the country it ought to be done, and I will express the hope that if this bill shall become a law—I trust it may not—the statements made by those who are advocating it to-day may be justified by facts.

There is need certainly for ameliorated conditions. So far as the transportation of live stock is concerned that is to be slaughtered and used for human food, I could wish that a measure which commended itself more to my limited intelligence had been presented to the Senate than the one that is now under consideration.

Several Senators, the last one being the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], have called attention to the fact, and it has been urged with great vehemence, that sometimes these cattle trains would reach their destination within two or three hours after the twenty-eight hours have expired and they are compelled to unload.

Mr. President, I think that is a hardship. Why was not a bill brought in here limiting this amelioration to that one instance? There would be no trouble about that. But while a hardship in that regard may be ameliorated——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. In a moment. It seems to me that in a great many other instances an added hardship will be the result.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. PATTERSON. Would it not be equally a hardship, should a train be belated and so detained that it would not reach the yards for unloading, feeding, or watering within four or five hours of the twenty-eight hours, to compel the owners of the cattle and the railway company both to be adjudged violators of the law or else to unload where there were no facilities?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I long ago learned that one swallow does not make a summer, and because this thing may happen now and then is no reason why we should enact legislation compelling a different order of things to be put into operation.

The Senator from Colorado, in an excess, I think, of exuberance or possibly of humor, for which he is so noted, went beyond himself when he suggested that the good people who are interested in this legislation and the few of us who are representing them as best we may to-day will probably, after a little while, take exception to the killing of cattle; that that will be a natural step in advance of our present position.

Mr. President, if some of the loads of cattle that I have seen on the railroads of this country are a sample, and if some of the pictures that have been painted of the conditions existing where those poor, fevered, tuberculous cattle are slaughtered in this country have any truth at all in them, I am inclined to think it might be a good idea for somebody to rise up and advocate what the Senator from Colorado has suggested. I do not know but we would all be better off.

Mr. President, it is urged with a good deal of force, and it is in this bill, that these cattle are to be attended by people who are interested in them, the owners or their representatives. I do not know how that may be, but I turn to the testimony given before the Interstate Commerce Committee, and on page 1220 I find the testimony of Mr. James C. Lincoln. Mr. Lincoln lives in St. Louis, and he is the general freight agent of the Missouri Pacific Railway, the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway, and several allied, leased, and operated lines embraced in what is known as the "Missouri Pacific Railway System," one of the great railway systems of the country. Mr. Lincoln gave a little testimony directly on this point. He was speaking, in the first place, of the burden—I do not know that he called it a burden, but upon the fact that they had to carry or did carry the attendants of these stock trains free of cost, and he said:

> Another incident in connection with the transportation of live stock is the fact that the carriers, on the assumption that the shipper will look after his stock and care for the same while in transit, issues free transportation in both directions to shippers with every two cars of stock and one way with each single car of stock. To the traffic managers of the country it is well known that this live-stock transportation is manipulated to the depletion of the carrier's earnings on passenger traffic. It is also well known that the transportation falls into the hands of parties ostensibly the agents of the shippers, who are thoroughly incompetent to care for the stock while on the road, and who in many instances do not even take the trouble of looking after the stock, the transportation being given to lawyers, merchants, and clerks as a matter of accommodation to enable them to make trips to the larger cities. These alleged attendants, and, for that matter, regular live-stock attendants, are not familiar with the operation of trains and with the yards and switches, and are therefore much more liable to personal injury through their ignorance.

Mr. President, I will venture to ask the Senator from Wyoming if it is to any considerable extent the custom of the shippers of live stock to find a man who wants to take a trip from Cheyenne, we will say, to Chicago, and he is given free transportation by the shipper, with the idea that he is going to look after the live stock? He may be a clerk, he may be, as this statement says, a merchant, lawyer, clergyman, or some other man who simply wants to deadhead his way from Wyoming to Chicago, and he becomes the care taker of that stock. Of course, I can see exactly where the shipper would be benefitted, because he would not lose the services of a man connected with his establishment for a minute, while if he sent one of his own men he would lose the time both on the journey outward and the journey inward, which would be a very considerable expense.

I know nothing about this beyond the testimony that Mr. Lincoln, who seems to be a well-qualified witness, has given. If it be so, I think we ought to express at least some degree of sympathy for the live stock that is put in the care of that class of men.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, I take it for granted that the Senator asks that question in good faith.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do, indeed, because I have it upon the testimony that is contained here on page 1239, by a very reputable witness.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, the gentleman who testifies there, of course, notwithstanding he represents strong roads, does not represent those that carry the larger share of the live stock of the country. I should be glad to read what comes before and what comes after the quotation. His main ground, if I understand it, is that the railroads are sending one man in both directions to each two cars or to send a man one way with one car. If the Missouri Pacific and those roads were as liberal as that in transportation, and were allowing a man for every two cars on a train, they would open the door themselves to that kind of fraud, because, if a man has but two cars of stock of course it requires a man to go with the two cars, but if he is shipping twenty cars of stock it does not require ten men to go with them. It is not the practice in my part of the country to do that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Lincoln does not say that.

Mr. WARREN. Whether he says it or not, if he says that he gives that much transportation, I say he is giving it in cases where there are some reasons other than the interests of the live stock during shipment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. All that can possibly be construed from this language is that if there are two cars of stock, two persons may be shipped; if there is one car, one person goes along with it; but he does not say that for twenty or thirty cars there will be an individual for each car.

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, I think from my knowledge of the case that is what he did mean there, because there are times when railroads in their competition have reached that point.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, I am still wrong there. What he does say is that they issue "free transportation in both directions to shippers with every two cars of stock and one way with each single car of stock."

Mr. WARREN. That is what I said.

Let me say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I have sent lawyers and merchants and clerks with live stock, but they were live-stock men before they were lawyers, and very competent ones. Many clerks and many merchants in the western part of the country were cowboys in earlier days. An attorney-general of the State of Wyoming, who served acceptably and well for years, came up to Wyoming over the trail from Texas with cattle.

Mr. GALLINGER. But did he accept service with the Senator to act as his agent to take a trip to Chicago?

Mr. WARREN. He would have been very glad to accompany me when I donned my overalls and went with stock. I was never too proud to do that sort of thing, and others feel that they are not.

Mr. GALLINGER. He was on a pleasure trip, I suppose?

Mr. WARREN. If you call rustling around with cattle a pleasure trip, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. He was deadheaded through from the point of shipment to the destination?

Mr. WARREN. One of the men in charge of the cattle, yes; and it often happens that way.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I want to say that in all those cases they are competent men. They go in pursuance of a duty, and they perform that duty. The fact that a man may fall from grace and become a lawyer or a merchant does not detract from the honesty of purpose of the man who was once a cowboy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, after a man has become a lawyer he certainly falls from grace if, for the sake of saving fare from Wyoming to Chicago, he accepts free transportation in charge of cattle.

Mr. WARREN. I distinctly stated he does not go that way; but when a man desires to go back to his earlier employment, as a sort of vacation, he is not open to any criticism from the Senator. They may look at things differently in New Hampshire, but in the western country it is no disgrace to get on rough clothing and do a little rough work.

Mr. GALLINGER. No people in all the world have done any more hustling in that direction than the people of New England. I am not making any criticism along this line, but I say the argument has been made that the stock is safe in the hands of those men, and that whatever representations or requests they make ought to be observed. I say that if they are the class of men that Mr. Lincoln represents as being sent in charge of stock trains I do not think that their representations or their wishes would count for very much, so far as the stock is concerned.

Mr. WARREN. He states simply an exception. That is not the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know the Senator from Wyoming is anxious to get a vote, and I really did not intend to occupy more than a moment of time.

The argument is made that the owners of this stock are humane people, and I presume that is true as a rule; but if there had not been abuses, there never would have been a law on the statute book in reference to this subject. There must have been abuses; there must have been a reason for it. Congress would not have legislated if there had been no ground for legislation. While perhaps the stockmen have become more humane than they were twenty or thirty years ago, when very evidently there was need of legislation, I am not quite sure that we ought not at least to hem them in by some restrictions at the present time. The argument of humanity has been made sometimes for a good cause and sometimes for a bad cause. It was made in the days of slavery, at first, that you could trust the slave owner to treat his slaves humanely, because they were his property; but while a great many of them did treat their slaves humanely, a great many of them did not.

It is a mere question, after all, of healthy legislation. I am not prepared to say a word more against this bill. If it becomes a law, I hope that every claim which has been made for it by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]—who, of course, is sincere in his advocacy of it, and who has no purpose to mislead the Senate in what he says—if it becomes a law, I shall hope, in the interest of humanity, which I trust I am always ready to advocate in a proper way—will be fulfilled; but I have my fears, or, as the Scotchman would say, "I hae my doots."

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. ANKENY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I yield to the Senator if he desires to ask me a question.

Mr. ANKENY. I wish to say a few words on the pending bill.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; I will yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. ANKENY. Mr. President, I know the cattle business very well; indeed, I have been engaged in it all my life. All the discussion which has taken place, of course, bears upon it; but from my intimate knowledge of the business, I will say that I believe this bill is in the interest of humanity, and is also in the interest of the good management of the cattle and stock business. I shall therefore vote for the measure.

One thing that seems to scare so many of the opponents of this bill, and to which they attach much importance, is the case where stock arrives at its destination in bad condition. In our portion of the country cattle are shipped from point to point, many of them for stock purposes. Very few are slaughtered at the time of their arrival. So the bugbear on that point does not arise with us. Stock is usually in good order. Most of them, I repeat, are stock cattle, though some of those cattle are taken to Nebraska to be fed.

I can not see any objection to this measure. I hope it will appeal to the people who are opposing it as a good and proper measure, and that it will correct the abuses and troubles to which we have been subjected by being compelled to land cattle from the cars where it ought not to be done and where it is impossible to do it to advantage and in such manner as to benefit the cattle.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the only knowledge that I have of the transportation of cattle by rail is what I have been able to see; and I am aware, from the utterances of wise men elsewhere, that what an ordinarily intelligent person is able to see is not evidence; that he must be an expert, and on the same authority I understand an expert to mean somebody who is interested in the business which is criticised.

Most of the cattle I have seen in transit have been in the East. I used to see many cattle trains in the eastern part of the country; but I see very few there now. The benefactors of mankind, who do our packing for us at Chicago, and who are now being persecuted, have pretty nearly stopped the traffic in live cattle in the East. They have been so solicitous for our welfare and so determined that we should have nothing but the best meat that when any butcher attempts to run a shop for the sale of locally killed beef they open another shop alongside of him and undersell him until they drive him out of business.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will allow me, he might go further than that. If a local butcher or dealer in meat should purchase an animal that has been fatted in Massachusetts or in New Hampshire, he is forbidden a supply of western beef to meet the necessities of his trade.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senators permit me to inquire of them if their State legislatures stand by and permit such a thing as that without enacting a law against it? Have you no antitrust legislation in your respective States?

Mr. LODGE. No State legislation could prevent the introduction of beef from the outside.

Mr. BAILEY. No; but State legislation could make it a crime to set down a shop by the side of a citizen of Massachusetts and close him up in that fashion, because that meat would have to be cut, as it could not be sold in the same packages in which it was brought, and, therefore, when they cut it it would become subject to the laws of Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it may be very easy to do that, but what law of a State would prevent a man from selling beef at any price he pleases? We have no such laws as that yet, I am free to say. We may be very backward, but we have not such laws.

Mr. BAILEY. The State of Massachusetts has been the pioneer in much useful legislation to correct corporations and corporate abuses; and I am glad to be privileged to say to one of her Senators that it is well within the power of the State to punish precisely that kind of competition, because, instead of being that competition which promotes a healthy commercial growth, the very purpose of it is to destroy competition. It is neither more nor less than a deliberate conspiracy against the health and commerce of the State. My own opinion is that there is no graver offense against sound commercial principle than such misconduct as the Senator from Massachusetts has just indicated.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the way exists, we have not yet found it, of compelling a man by law to sell beef to another man—I mean the dealer, of course—or to fix the price at which the beef shall be sold.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator must not understand me as saying that that is either permissible or wise legislation, but what I do say is that when an individual or a corporation opens an establishment by the side of another individual or corporation and enters upon a course of commerce designed purely and only for the purpose of destroying a competitor, it is a crime against good morals, and it ought to be a crime everywhere against statutory enactment.

Mr. LODGE. That, as the Senator well knows, usually occurs under conditions where it would be something extremely hard to prove the case.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course.

Mr. LODGE. In practice it is almost impossible to do so. There is no doubt, however, of the fact either of what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] states about the refusal to sell to local butchers western beef if they sell beef they get anywhere else—domestic beef—or about lowering the price in the neighborhood at more than one place.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say, before the Senator proceeds further with his interesting remarks, that I hope he will not hold the cattle growers responsible for the condition he describes.

Mr. LODGE. I will come to the cattle grower by and by.

Mr. WARREN. The cattle growers have for a long time been the sufferers from the conditions produced by the packers, and they have inveighed against it more than have the consumers. They are the ones to complain.

Mr. LODGE. In the remarks I am making I am merely leading up to the facts and explaining why it was that of late years we have seen so few cattle trains in the East. The remarks I have thus far made were merely incidental, and they were not designed to more than explain that situation. It is owing to the facts I have stated that we see so few cattle on the hoof in the East now, where we used to see cattle trains and also large herds of cattle driven in on the hoof for slaughter. It is owing, I say, to the efforts of these gentlemen in Chicago, who, we are assured, are perfectly faultless and working only for the benefit of mankind.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts state who has been championing the morals and humanity of the packers of beef?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Colorado is an experienced parliamentarian and is well aware that it is not in order in this body to refer to the utterances of members of another body.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am glad, at least, that we have got the admission from the Senator from Massachusetts that nobody in this Chamber has undertaken that task as yet.

Mr. LODGE. No; we have not.

Mr. PATTERSON. It may be that we may find them on this floor.

Mr. LODGE. The subject has not yet been discussed, Mr. President.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not say we will probably find them on this floor before the session closes.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senate acted extremely wisely when they put on the amendment in relation to beef inspection without discussing it, and I think we should have been much better off if that course had been followed elsewhere; but that is by the way.

But in what cattle trains I see the cattle always impress me when I am looking at them—not as an expert or as a live-stock man, but simply as a plain citizen—the cattle always look to me extremely unhappy and uncomfortable, and in hot weather they seem to be suffering greatly.

Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has explained that with wild cattle it is necessary to pack them very closely in order to prevent their fighting and injuring each other when they fight. Whether or not that danger of combat applies to sheep packed too closely, I am not enough of a live-stock man to say; but I have seen sheep and hogs packed so tightly that they seemed to me to be suffering a great deal, and I saw no signs of the sheep fighting each other or anything of that sort.

I understand that the extension of time to thirty-six hours in this bill is proposed in the interest of humanity to the cattle or live stock transported. That is exactly where my lack of expert knowledge comes in, for I do not see how it can benefit them. I am perfectly willing to admit, what, of course, everybody must know to be true, that the difference between the condition of the railroads now and their condition at the time the original law was enacted is very great. We have better rails; we have better roadbeds; the tracks are better ballasted; it is all immensely improved. That is, of course, a benefit to the cattle; but I still come back to the point of the main question of time. It seems to me that when cattle are traveling packed together standing up, especially in very hot weather, every hour that you add makes their suffering greater.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] said as the reductio ad absurdum that he supposed some of these theorists to whom he referred would presently urge that no cattle should be killed. Mr. President, we have to kill animals in order to feed ourselves; but it is none the less a painful and disagreeable thing to do, and I imagine that the animal does not enjoy the process. Certainly in bringing them to the slaughterhouse we ought at least, not merely in humanity to them, but in our own interest, use all the kindness and gentleness that is possible.

The only actual moving of live stock that I have ever had occasion to know anything about is to take two or three horses, perhaps, from here to my home in Massachusetts. For many years it was possible to do that by boat, and the horses went extremely well and in very good condition. The boats will no longer take horses, and it becomes necessary to send them by rail. I have tried that method. I know—and I am sure that anyone else who has had occasion to send horses in that way will agree with me—that it is cheaper to send horses by express, so that they go almost as quickly as you can go yourself on the fastest trains, at double the rate of ordinary freight, than to send them by ordinary freight. Horses sent in that way of course have men with them. They are watered and fed, and they are not crowded. They are treated with the utmost possible care, and yet every additional hour that they are kept on the train is an injury to them and they suffer to that extent. I can not speak of cattle or their transportation, but I know something about horses, and I know that the mere retention of a horse in a train, especially in warm weather, is an injury to him and that he suffers from it; and I draw the not unnatural inference that what is true of the horse may be true of other animals when it is necessary to transport them by rail.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like the Senator to state the length of time it usually occupies in transporting horses from here to Boston, and whether or not in transitu the horses are taken out and fed?

Mr. LODGE. You can send the horses by express.

Mr. PATTERSON. I know; but I mean by freight; the way you sent your horses.

Mr. LODGE. It generally takes forty-eight hours, I think; though sometimes more. The horses can be taken out. Often there is ample time to take them out at Jersey City. The cars are arranged with stalls. Men accompany the horses, and when the train stops they look after them. That is the way horses are carried, and yet every additional hour they remain on the train is an injury to the animal. There is no question about that; and it is a saving to pay double rates on the horses and avoid the additional time on the cars.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I think it fairer in discussing a question of this kind to make the statement as it is, and as it is proposed by those who support the bill, than to state it otherwise. Now, when the statement is made alone that this bill will operate to keep cattle on the cars for an additional length of time, and you leave it as if that were the whole proposition, you do an injustice, because we are not lengthening the time in changing the law, except under circumstances that render it more humane to lengthen the hours and by making up for it in some other way. To stop every twenty-eight hours and interrupt the progress of the car to enforce the present law oftentimes causes the cattle to stand in a car on a sidetrack all night, and even then they have to move backward next day to some feeding yard, whereas if they moved forward during the night without interruption they would arrive at some place where they could be unloaded many hours earlier and yet be nearer their destination.

Mr. LODGE. I am coming to that part of it in a moment. I am not going to misstate it. I was trying to state, first, what seemed to me an objection in increasing the length of time from twenty-eight hours to thirty-six hours. That is without reference to the unloading or reloading, which I am coming to. I am speaking of the increased length of time which this bill will permit cattle to be kept in the car. It is true it is said that it shall be done on request, but we may take it that it will always be done in practice.

The argument is made that the train may be delayed, that the cattle may be within an hour or two of their destination, and yet the twenty-eight-hour law would compel them to unload and reload. Mr. President, increasing the limit to thirty-six hours would simply enlarge the zone; that is all. You may find places where it is thirty-seven hours to the destination, and you will have to unload an hour away from it. You may have delays even when the limit is thirty-six hours. Making the limit thirty-six hours does not eliminate accidents or delays. All the things for which the extension of this limit is urged may occur with thirty-six hours as the outside time as well as with twenty-eight hours.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. It may be slightly reduced, but not much.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LODGE. Allow me to finish my sentence. The fact is, every one of the arguments lead straight to the proposition that there ought to be no limit at all; that we ought to trust it entirely to the men in charge of the cattle and to the live-stock owners without any limit of time at all. That is the logical argument, because otherwise we accept the proposition that some limitation is necessary, and that it is proper to put on a pretty reasonable limitation that will necessitate a fairly frequent loading or unloading of the cattle. It is only logical that there should be no limit, and the bill provides that men responsible for it shall not be made liable in any way, which would be in keeping with taking off all limit of time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator evidently, as he says, has never shipped cattle. The operation of the bill is simply this——

Mr. LODGE. I admitted that in the beginning in the hope that it would put an end to this continual making the point that the man is not an expert who has not shipped cattle. I admit that once for all.

Mr. WARREN. I am saying that to excuse the very absurd statement you have just made.

Mr. LODGE. You need not excuse my statements. I will take care of them.

Mr. WARREN. Very well, I will take care of them, too, to some extent, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. LODGE. I hope you will, but in your own time.

Mr. WARREN. Am I not to have the opportunity now?

Mr. LODGE. Not if you want to interrupt me for that sort of thing. If you are going to interrupt to ask me a question, I shall be delighted to have you do it.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will not interrupt me——

Mr. LODGE. I can not interrupt in my own time, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. What I was about to say, Mr. President, was that the extension of time to thirty-six hours would not make any difference whatever with the plans of the feeding stations or with keeping the regular runs within the twenty-eight hours. If you are going a forty-hour journey, there will be as near as there can be a feeding station provided in the middle of the journey. They would not go twenty-eight hours, but twenty hours. Regular runs will be confined at the very outside to twenty-eight hours, so far as the anticipated limits of the journey and the several runs are concerned. The application of the thirty-six-hour law will only come when unforeseen circumstances render it necessary to have the extra time, such as a delay—a behind-time train—which will cause them to be caught between proper feeding and unloading stations.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no doubt that is all perfectly true, but I do not see why you can not be caught with a thirty-six-hour limit as well as with one of twenty-eight hours. The bill provides for the addition of eight hours. You of course increase the zone that is within reach in one journey in the cattle country, but certainly by taking thirty-six hours you can not alter the fact that you may get within an hour of your destination and then may have to unload. It certainly does not change any of those conditions or prevent accidents or prevent delays. It is simply making it perhaps a little more elastic.

My proposition is that if that argument is carried to its logical conclusion it means there ought not to be any limitation. I do not see any other way with it but to leave it to the enlightened self-interest——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me just a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. It seems to me the Senator from Massachusetts ought to bear in mind that these railway companies have got their cars, their chutes, and their stations for feeding and watering cattle at stated intervals, and in the transporting of stock the location of these yards must always be taken into consideration. They have been erected with reference to the twenty-eight-hour limit. I have no doubt about that in the world. That is not going to be altered because of the leeway of eight hours that is proposed to be given. So that the twenty-eight-hour proposition is the proposition that is almost certain to prevail, and for that reason the eight-hour leeway will be the exceptional result almost necessarily.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the bill proposes to give more leeway. If it were carried out logically, it would be better to provide that each man should decide for himself. In other words, we are assured again and again that enlightened self-interest will prevent injury to the cattle and the live stock. Enlightened self-interest, Mr. President, would prevent a man injuring his children or his wife, and yet it is necessary to have laws to prevent the abuse of wives and children. Enlightened self-interest would prevent the destruction of the game and the fish, with which this country was more largely endowed than probably any country in the world; and yet the men to whom it is of the most importance resist to the utmost any legislation, both State and national, which looks to the preservation of the food fishes and of game birds and game animals which are suited for the consumption of man.

If we could rely on enlightened self-interest, we should need very little law indeed. But we can not rely on it. In the first place, men do not understand very well their real interest, and they are not enlightened about it very frequently when they think they understand it. The old story of killing the goose that lays the golden egg is brought every day within our sight in dealing with a great many questions.

When it comes to the matter of enlightened self-interest, take the matter which has been alluded to this afternoon—the case of the packing houses at Chicago. What would enlightened self-interest dictate? That they should be above suspicion, and that they should welcome any legislation which would make their products of undoubted purity and merit in the eyes of the people of the world. What do we see? We see these men, with their business perishing beneath their eyes, fighting the legislation which—and it matters not whether the charges are true or false—is the only thing in the world which can restore the character of their products in the markets of the world. They are called great business men, and certainly ought to be governed by enlightened self-interest——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am very sorry the Senator from Massachusetts has taken that subject to illustrate a point against the bill under consideration. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether he understands that the report upon which he predicates the statement he has made shows that 92 per cent of the products of the Chicago packing houses is perfect and that the examination of the Government is beyond criticism?

Mr. LODGE. I am not arguing the merits of that report. If the Senator had listened to what I had said, he would have understood me to say what I now repeat, that from the point I am making it is of no earthly consequence whether that report is true, as I believe it to be in the main, or whether it is untrue. There is no question as to what the markets of the world think about it.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. I say if those people were not stupid beyond words, if they had not been so absolutely stupified by greed for money, they would welcome legislation which would put their products in the markets of the world in such a way that no one could doubt their merit.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I am not going to argue the question.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator wants me to do it I will. I am quite ready to discuss the morals and methods of the packers of Chicago, but just now I am only discussing their lack of intelligence and their blindness to public opinion.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from Massachusetts has assumed that these people do not want inspection and that they are fighting legislation. I desire to correct him upon that point, as he can evidently be corrected upon the facts themselves. The Chicago beef packers are not fighting inspection, but, on the contrary, welcome it, and the most severe that can be had.

They realize that after a good many of the wild statements which have been made in the country and sent abroad, it is important to American interests that there be legislation of a character that will stop this hysteria which is evidently spreading over the entire world.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether they are resisting it or not, but they sent a man here who purported to be their representative, who undertook to resist it at the hearings before the House committee, if he was correctly reported in the newspapers.

Mr. HOPKINS. The best way to find out——

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether he was their representative or not. I am speaking merely from what appeared in the newspapers.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator evidently has not read the evidence taken before the House committee.

Mr. LODGE. I read all of it that appeared in the newspapers. I read the testimony of the man who purported to be their agent. I do not know whether he was their agent or not. He purported to be, and was accepted with open arms by the committee as such. I believe his name was Wilson. I do not know whether I am correct in that or not.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I think it is unfair to compare the so-called "enlightened self-interest" of the Chicago beef packers with the enlightened self-interest of the cattle grower. It is not enlightened self-interest in the case of the beef packers. It is simply the license that has grown out of a power, by reason of money and the associations and the combinations of beef packers, which made them believe they were absolutely above all law and above all criticism. Such is not the case, Mr. President, with the cattle growers.

I desire to say for the cattle growers that their sentiment, as it has come to me by numerous telegrams, is that "What we want is legislation, since it has to come, and we want it quickly, and we care not how stringent the legislation may be. The delay is ruining our business, and we are the real sufferers for the shortcomings of the beef packers." The cattle growers of the country want legislation, and they want it quickly, and they do not care where the expense of the legislation may fall.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely used the packers as an instance of how impossible it is to rely on enlightened self-interest for the enforcement always of proper regulations in regard to any matter like the transportation of cattle or the preparation of food products. In those instances, as in many others, enlightened self-interest has been found to be an imperfect guide. Nothing was further from my thought than to compare the packers with the cattle raisers. I have the highest respect for that great body of men who are engaged in one of the most important industries in this country; and I notice that their representative, when he appeared before the House committee, if he was correctly reported, said substantially what I have said here this afternoon. He seemed to think that somebody was resisting the legislation. I refer to Mr. Cowan, who appeared before the committee in the House, and said that whether the Government was to pay for inspection or whether the cattle raiser and packer was to pay it—he thought the Government ought to pay it—was a secondary point; that what was needed was legislation and legislation at once, just as the Senator from Colorado says; legislation which the people shall believe real legislation and of some effect, and that nothing else would be of value to the cattle business. I think I have quoted him with substantial correctness.

I had not the slightest intention of comparing for one moment the packers in Chicago with the cattle raisers of the United States, for I have great respect for the cattle growers and cattle raisers of the United States.

Mr. President, I have spoken much longer than I meant to. I hope this bill will prove to be all that its friends think it is. It seems to me a mistake to extend the time. The bill contains many useful provisions, which will improve the law in many directions, as is pointed out in the report and in the memorandum of the officers of the Department of Agriculture. But I can not myself, probably from my lack of expert knowledge, see the value of the extension to thirty-six hours, and I merely wish to put on record my protest against that part of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 3, line 7, after the word "That," to strike out "in the case of sheep, when the expiration of the time limit occurs at night, they may be allowed to continue in transit until daylight, if by so doing they will reach a place where they can be properly fed, watered, and cared for," and insert "it shall not be required that sheep be unloaded in the nighttime, but where the time expires in the nighttime in case of sheep the same may continue in transit to a suitable place for unloading, subject to the aforesaid limitation of thirty-six hours."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would ask the Senator from Wyoming whether the committee has accepted the amendments proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] as committee amendments?

Mr. WARREN. They have.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 2, to strike out section 5, in the following words:

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of every railroad, express company, car company, and of every common carrier other than by water, and of the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, wholly or in part engaged in the transportation of live stock by railroad from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, to transport said live stock so by it or him being transported with due diligence, and to maintain in all trains containing ten or more cars of live stock which is being transported from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia an average minimum rate of speed of not less than 16 miles per hour from the time any such live stock is loaded upon or into its or his cars, and made part of said train, until such train reaches its destination, or junction point for delivery to another carrier, deducting only in the computation of such average minimum speed such reasonable time as the live stock may be necessarily delayed in unloading to feed, water, and rest, and in feeding, watering, and resting, and in reloading, and such time as the live stock may be delayed by storm or by other accidental or unavoidable causes which can not be anticipated or avoided by the exercise of due diligence and foresight.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, strike out section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. That any railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, and the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them who knowingly and willfully fails to comply with the provisions of section 5 shall for every such failure be liable for and pay a penalty of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, which shall be recovered as provided in section 4 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call the Senator's attention to page 4, line 8. I suggest that the word "therefore" should be "therefor."

Mr. PATTERSON. That is right.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Secretary to change it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the word "therefore" and insert "therefor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a half dozen or dozen letters from the Department of Agriculture and its experts in relation to the bill just passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 9, 1906.

DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of the 6th instant, inclosing a copy of Senate bill 3413, regulating the confinement of cattle in cars, etc., and have looked the bill over with some care. I think it will meet the emergencies that now exist in the transportation of live stock, but I will have another letter written to you about it when we have had time to make a more critical examination of the measure.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
Washington, D. C., April 9, 1906.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WARREN: In fulfillment of the promise made in a recent telephone conversation I am sending you herewith some comment on the measures now before Congress amending sections 4286–4390, Revised Statutes. You will understand, of course, that the views expressed are personal opinions, as I am in no sense authorized to speak for the Department.

On pages 57–61 of the printed hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, on House bill 47, proposing to extend the time for which cattle and other animals may be confined during shipment from one State to another, you will find a copy of a letter of the Secretary of Agriculture to the President. On page 59 the Secretary says:

"Based upon a careful observation of the workings of the law, the treatment of the cattle, and the advantage of the shippers and owners of live stock, it is my belief that if certain other amendments to the law, hereinafter described, shall be adopted, the time during which cattle may be confined in cars without food, rest, and water may be extended from twenty-eight hours to thirty-six hours without disadvantage to the cattle."

The other amendments which the Secretary declared necessary are found on pages 60 and 61, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6, and are as follows:

"1. For reasons hereinbefore stated, provide that the time during which animals may be confined in cars without food, rest, and water be extended from twenty-eight hours to thirty-six hours.

"2. Provide that the cattle must be loaded and unloaded in a humane manner into properly equipped pens. This is a serious omission in the present law.

"3. Provide that the owner or shipper of the animals may furnish the necessary food if he so desires. Many companies have charged most exorbitant fees for supplying food, and, as the law gives a lien on the stock for food furnished, shippers and owners of stock have been in many cases outrageously overcharged.

"5. The statute should be broadened to cover practically every common carrier of live stock, including a receiver of any company. The Supreme Court has held, in the case of The United States v. Harris (177 U. S., 305), that existing law does not include the receiver of a railroad company. At the present time a certain railroad, now in the hands of a Federal receiver, is confining animals fifty and even sixty hours without food, rest, and water.

"6. The statute should be amended to cover the transportation of animals from a State to a Territory, or from a Territory to a State. The United States district court for the district of Kansas has held recently, in the case of The United States v. The St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company (an unreported case), that the law does not cover a shipment from a Territory to a State, the wording of the statute being '* * * which transports live stock from one State to another.'"

* * * * * * *

In conclusion, I desire to say that, in my candid opinion, S. 3413, as amended by the committee and with the amendments submitted by Senator HEYBURN, is the best possible measure which can be secured at this time, and if the bill becomes the law, the treatment of cattle by transportation companies can be rendered far more humane than can be secured under the present twenty-eight-hour law, under which the Department can not require properly equipped pens nor humane loading and unloading. The extra eight hours' time will be requested by the shipper, in the majority of cases, only when his cattle can thereby get to market without unloading, and the extra time the cattle are confined is more than offset by the provision which will secure for them humane loading and unloading, proper pens, and decent food.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. P. MCCABE.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,

MY DEAR SENATOR: In further reply to your letter of the 6th instant, asking my views upon Senate bill 3413, relating to live-stock shipping, I have to say that after further careful consideration the bill appears to us to be satisfactory, and I believe we can handle the business advantageously under its terms.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1906.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WARREN: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 23, in which you inquire whether the Department has any recent reports or comunications from live-stock inspectors or agents on the question of railroad transportation of live stock.

In reply you are informed that on May 10, 1906, the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry sent out to the inspectors and agents in charge of the field stations of his Bureau the following circular letter:

"It is desired that you write a letter to the Chief of the Bureau immediately, setting out your candid views on the following points, based upon your personal observation of the transportation of live stock:

"1. Do you consider it inhuman or injurious to meat product to detain live stock in cars without food, rest, and water for a period of not to exceed twenty-eight hours?

"2. When animals have been confined for a period of twenty-eight hours and can reach their final destination within eight hours more, from a humane standpoint is it better to unload the cattle for food, rest, and water at the end of the twenty-eight hours or to carry them through to destination?

"3. Which do you consider preferable: To unload sheep at night, or, when the time limit fixed by law expires in the nighttime, to carry them on in the cars until daylight?

"4. Considering the matter wholly from a humane standpoint, is the operation of section 4386, Revised Statutes, popularly known as "the twenty-eight-hour law," beneficial?

"5. Do you consider that the humane treatment of live stock in transit would be bettered by a strict enforcement of the present twenty-eight-hour law?"

Up to this time the Department has received sixteen replies from Inspectors and agents in charge, which are inclosed herewith. The opinions of these men seem to agree very well upon the best and most humane course to pursue in the treatment of live stock in process of transportation, and as each one of them has had years of familiarity with the railroad transportation of live stock, their views are, in my opinion, entitled to a very considerable weight.

After the inclosed letters have served your purpose I shall be very glad to have them returned to the Department.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Local Office, Kansas City, Kans., May 15, 1906.

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to the transportation of live stock, I would offer the following observations:

1. I do not consider it inhuman or injurious to meat product to detain live stock in cars without feed, rest, or water for a period not to exceed twenty-eight hours.

2. When animals have been confined for a period of twenty-eight hours, and can reach their final destination within eight hours more, from a humane standpoint I consider it better to carry them through to destination, provided the trip can be completed in eight hours more.

3. I consider it preferable to unload sheep at night, when the time limit fixed by law expires, provided the facilities for doing so are first class. If not, I would consider it best to carry them on until daylight.

4. Considering the matter wholly from a humane standpoint, the operation of section 4386, Revised Statutes, is not beneficial, and in a great many cases very injurious, especially when animals are unloaded at small stations and in muddy yards, and without properly constructed water troughs and hayracks, which is generally the case at small stations.

5. I do not consider that the humane treatment of live stock in transit would be bettered by a strict enforcement of the twenty-eight-hour law; but would suggest that if animals were carried on cars twenty-eight hours that the time limit for feed, rest, and water be made three hours; but if carried on for thirty-six hours, that the time limit for rest, etc., be made six to eight hours. Also that all stock must be properly fed and watered immediately prior to their being loaded, and that the cars must be properly cleaned and bedded.

Very respectfully,

L. R. BAKER,
Inspector in Charge.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Local Office, National Stock Yards, Ill., May 14, 1906.

Dr. A. D. MELVIN,
Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Washington, D. C.

SIR: My candid opinion is that it is not inhuman or injurious to the meat product to detain live stock in cars without food, rest, and water for a period of not to exceed twenty-eight hours, and I am firmly convinced, from very careful observations of the transportation of live stock, that it is positively inhuman and injurious to the meat product to unload cattle for food, rest, and water at the end of twenty-eight hours when they can reach their destination in eight hours more. When the time limit fixed by law expires at night, I consider it preferable, from a humane standpoint, to carry sheep on in the cars until daylight.

Considering the matter wholly from a humane standpoint, the operation of section 4386, Revised Statutes, is not beneficial. The virtue of its operation is insignificant in comparison with the evils and inhumanity obtained from its enforcement, and I do not consider that the humane treatment of live stock in transit would be bettered by strict enforcement of the present "twenty-eight-hour law."

Very respectfully,

J. B. CLANCY, Inspector.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Local Office, Denver, Colo., May 16, 1906.

CHIEF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to Bureau letter dated May 10, 1906, in regard to my views, based upon personal observation of the transportation of live stock, I will say that the views as given below are not only held by me, but is the unanimous opinion of all the men now engaged in inspecting live stock for shipment on this force:

1. I do not consider it inhuman or injurious to the meat product to detain live stock in cars without food, rest, and water for a period of not to exceed twenty-eight hours.

2. When animals have been confined for a period of twenty-eight hours and can reach their final destination within eight hours more I consider it far better, from a humane standpoint, to allow them to be carried through to destination without unloading for feed, rest, and water, as, in my opinion, based upon personal observation, the stock will undergo more hardship in the unloading and reloading than to be allowed to run the additional eight hours and then be unloaded and thoroughly rested, fed, and watered.

3. It is much better to allow sheep to be carried through until daylight in cases where the time fixed by law expires in the nighttime. Sheep that have to be unloaded in the night are of necessity very roughly treated, and it is against their nature and habits to move freely or at all in the nighttime.

4. Considering the matter wholely from a humane standpoint, the operation of section 4386, Revised Statutes, popularly known as the "twenty-eight-hour law," is not beneficial in many cases, particularly when the stock could reach final destination if allowed to run eight hours longer, or if it compels unloading in the nighttime, or if it compels unloading at stations where feeding and watering facilities are not good, when eight hours' additional time would carry them to a station where feeding and watering facilities were good.

5. I do not consider that the humane treatment of live stock in transit would be bettered by a strict enforcement of the present twenty-eight-hour law, for reasons as given above.

Very respectfully,

LOWELL CLARKE.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Local Office, Salt Lake City, Utah, May 15, 1906.

CHIEF OF BUREAU, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your letter of May 10:

Answer to question 1: I do not consider it inhuman to retain live stock in cars without feed or water for a period of twenty-eight hours. The natural shrinkage caused by the confinement would be the only possible injury that could be done to the meat product.

Answer to question 2: From a humane standpoint, I consider it better to carry all live stock to their destination if the time consumed will not exceed eight hours in excess of the twenty-eight-hour limit.

Answer to question 3: It is almost impossible to unload sheep at night, and I consider it very inhuman, and believe, from a humane standpoint, that it is much better to carry them until daylight before unloading.

Answer to question 4: I do not consider the strict compliance or enforcement of the twenty-eight-hour law beneficial from a humane standpoint.

Answer to question 5: I do not.

Very respectfully, yours,

GEO. S. HICKOX,
Agent in Charge.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Local Office, Chicago, Ill., May 21, 1906.

CHIEF OF BUREAU, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 10th instant concerning the "twenty-eight-hour law," the following is submitted:

1. No.

2. Carry them through to destination, provided the time does not exceed thirty-six hours.

3. Carry them on the cars until daylight.

4. The "twenty-eight-hour law" is better than nothing, and the enforcement of this law resulted in faster runs and in this way was an advantage to the shipper. I have seen cattle that were in the cars fifty-four hours while coming only 540 miles, yet they arrived in good condition apparently. I do not consider it inhuman to keep cattle on train thirty-six hours, but I think this should be the limit.

5. The enforcement of the twenty-eight-hour law might force the railroad companies to make better runs rather than build feeding sheds, but I do not think cattle would be benefited by being unloaded for feed and water every twenty-eight hours. The unloading in strange pens and new surroundings and the consequent reloading unduly excites particularly western cattle, and would probably do more harm than good.

Very respectfully,

S. E. BENNETT, Inspector.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Local Office, Fargo, N. Dak., May 17, 1906.

CHIEF OF BUREAU, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In reply to your circular letter to inspectors in charge, under date of May 10, in regard to the workings of the twenty-eight-hour law, will state that I have from the past ten years' experience formed the following opinions:

First. That it is not inhuman or in any way injurious to the meat product to detain live stock in cars twenty-eight hours without food or water. Stock that has been reasonably handled, loaded on a fill, will not care for food or water before the nervousness caused by loading and car fright has worn off.

Second. That when animals have been confined in cars en route for a period of twenty-eight hours and can reach final destination within eight hours more, it is more humane to run range stock on to final destination in cars that have facilities for hay and water than it is to unload. Stock going to market from the West for the first twenty-four or twenty-eight hours suffer more from excitement of loading, car fright, passing trains, headlights, etc., than anything else; and when cars have been well hayed at loading point the stock will have just begun to get over this nervousness and start to eat, and will not suffer as much by being confined for eight hours more as they will by being unloaded and subjected to the ordeal of loading and unloading again.

Third. In the matter of unloading sheep at night, when the time limit fixed by law expires, will say that with a train load this is all but impossible, and sheep might better be carried on until daylight, covering one more division and being that much closer to market, than sitting on a side track and losing this much time without any possible benefit being derived, as passing trains will keep them from resting any, even if the cars are standing still.

Fourth. Considering the twenty-eight-hour law purely from a humane standpoint, I do not believe with strict enforcement that it accomplishes the desired ends, as in many instances that have met my personal observation it has worked otherwise. Say, for instance, a train of sheep are loaded at a Montana loading point and arrive at Mandan, N. Dak., at 2 a. m. the following morning, and have been on the cars twenty-six hours; they can not reach Jamestown, N. Dak., the next feeding point, within the time limit prescribed by law, but could reach it in thirty to thirty-two hours; so, to comply with the law they must stop at Mandan and lay on the side track until morning without benefit to sheep, owner, railroad, or anyone else. If this train could be sent on to Jamestown and unloaded at daylight, the sheep would get the same rest and be 100 miles nearer destination, the same results be obtained from a humane standpoint that strict compliance with the twenty-eight-hour law would have accomplished. As anyone who has tried to unload sheep after dark or watched the effort being made knows, this can only be accomplished by punching, dogging, and driving the animals frantic before they will leave the cars at night, as lights and shadows from them only make it worse.

Fifth. For the reasons stated above, based on actual experience, I do not believe that a strict enforcement of the twenty-eight-hour law would be beneficial to live stock from a humane standpoint.

Very respectfully,

R. H. TREACY, Inspector in Charge.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to circular letter dated the 10th instant, from the Chief of Bureau, relative to the unloading and feeding of cattle and sheep while in transit:

In this matter the scope covered is so broad and the condition so varied that I will in this letter confine myself wholly to range animals.

To my mind it hardly seems possible to frame a general regulation or law to cover same in a satisfactory manner. For example, sucking calves and lambs fret almost continuously when taken from their mothers and eat and drink but little while in transit, and the sooner said animals can be gotten on to the market the better. While it may hardly seem consistent, I am of the opinion that these young animals will stand a longer haul than mature animals. Emaciated cattle should, in my opinion, be unloaded and fed frequently, and when more than 4 per cent of said animals are down in the cars they should be unloaded and fed at the first available corrals regardless of time in transit. On this class of stuff the minimum time on feed or for feeding might be doubled with beneficial results.

1. Shipment of meat-producing animals always injurious. Retaining all in cars for a period not to exceed twenty-eight hours will not reduce said injury to the minimum.

2. If animals are riding well, proceed to destination providing same can be reached in thirty-six hours, taking for the basis the running time already made.

3. Unloading sheep from cars at night is almost a physical impossibility, and if the distance to the next feeding point is consistent with the schedule already made by said shipment, I would recommend that they be permitted to carry them to the next feeding point.

4. As applied indiscriminately, no.

5. I do not consider that the humane treatment of live stock in transit would be better by a strict enforcement of the present twenty-eight-hour law. Lowering the running schedule is of the greatest importance from a humane as well as other standpoints.

Very respectfully,

LOUIS METSKER,
Inspector in Charge.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Local Office, Fort Worth, Tex., May 14, 1906.

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to circular letter of the 10th instant relative to the "twenty-eight-hour law," and taking up questions in the order as given:

1. I do not consider it at all inhuman or injurious to detain live stock in good condition on cars without food, rest, and water for a period of twenty-eight hours, under ordinary circumstances. The time when such detention becomes inhuman is to a great extent relative, depending largely on the condition of the animals and the circumstances under which shipment is made.

2. As a rule it is much better to carry through to destination.

3. Would advise carrying on cars until daylight.

4. Yes.

5. No; no fixed time limit applicable to all classes of animals can be made. What would be the kindest treatment when applied to strong range steers, for instance, would be absolute cruelty in connection with poor and enfeebled cattle. In the former case a run of thirty-six to forty hours, or even longer, would entail neither injury nor distress, while in the latter a period of even twenty hours might find many of the cattle down and in a condition calling imperatively for the relief which could only be afforded by unloading.

Animals as a rule suffer little, if at all, from lack of food and water in an ordinary journey of, say, forty-eight hours. It is well known that animals on short rations travel incomparably better than those which are heavily fed and watered just before or in transit. Most of the suffering to which stock is subjected is due to bad weather conditions and the animals getting down, when they are trampled upon. This last is generally due either to the poor condition of the animals before starting or to bad judgment in loading, the cars being either over or under loaded.

While the humane side of this question should be given due weight, the economic features should also receive consideration. An indiscriminate enforcement of the present law is neither desirable from an economic standpoint nor necessary from a humane one. Except under certain circumstances, it is against the interest of both the shipper and the railroad to keep stock in the cars for a period which will cause injury. It is these exceptions which require legislative restriction. What is needed is a law which will permit carrying stock in good condition for a period of thirty-six to forty hours, but which will compel animals to be unloaded within twenty-four hours if their condition demands it.

Very respectfully,

A. H. WALLACE,
Inspector, B. A. I.

Dr. A. D. MELVIN,
Chief of Bureau, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In reply to letter of May 10, based upon my personal observation of the transportation of live stock, I respectfully submit the following answers:

1. When comfortably loaded I do not consider it inhuman or injurious to the meat product to detain live stock in cars without food, rest, and water for a period of not to exceed twenty-eight hours.

2. When animals are properly loaded, according to my judgment, it would be much better to allow them to continue on their journey, providing they can reach their destination inside of thirty-six hours. Loading and unloading necessarily causes more or less damage to the stock. It is an experience entirely new to them, something they are not accustomed to; causes them fright, necessitates more or less pounding and jamming against the sides of the car and of the door, causing bruises, etc., and sometimes breaking of bones and crippling in various ways.

3. I consider it preferable to allow sheep to continue in the cars until daylight, providing they can reach their destination inside or close to thirty-six hours. As a matter of fact, it is almost impossible to unload sheep in the dark.

4. Taking everything into consideration wholly from a humane standpoint, I do not in all cases consider "the twenty-eight-hour law" beneficial. When stock can reach its destination in from thirty-two to thirty-six hours, I believe that it is better for the animals to be allowed to continue on their journey without unloading and reloading at the end of twenty-eight hours. In order not to violate the twenty-eight-hour law, in many cases the railroads unload and reload stock, whereas in from six to eight hours longer they would have reached their final destination. On the other hand, if it were not for the strict enforcement of the law specifying the intervals that should elapse between the feeding and watering of stock, the animals would be left in some instances for longer periods than would be humane without food and water, and would cause a great amount of suffering amongst the live stock.

5. I believe in many cases the strict enforcement of "the twenty-eight-hour law" would not better the humane treatment of live stock in transit. The loading of stock has much to do with the condition the animals are in when they arrive at their destination. Stock properly loaded will be in better condition at the end of thirty-six hours than stock crowded into cars would be at the end of twenty-eight hours. At a great many feeding points the facilities for unloading are very poor, and stock is greatly abused in being taken off and reloaded. Therefore I am of the opinion that a maximum of thirty-six hours would cause no great suffering if the stock was properly loaded.

From my observation and knowledge of the delay in stock en route to this market, I think the railroads are, in a great many instances, grossly negligent, as in many cases stock loaded at stations in the West arrive here within the time limit, and within a few hours other stock loaded at the same station would be delayed along the route and be unloaded once or twice at the different feeding stations and not arrive here within thirty-six to sixty hours, with the same weather conditions existing.

With your permission, I would like to make a suggestion in regard to the shipment of live stock. If it were possible, the railroads ought to be compelled to placard their cars, stating point of shipment and hour and date of loading.

Very respectfully,

BERNHARD P. WENDE,
Inspector in Charge.

Dr. A. D. MELVIN,

DEAR DOCTOR: Replying to yours of 10th instant with reference to the five questions regarding the transportation of live stock.

1. I do not consider it inhuman or injurious to meat product to detain stock in cars without food, rest, or water for a period not exceeding twenty-eight hours.

2. I think it better to ship through to destination rather than unload if destination can be reached within an additional period of eight hours.

3. I consider it much preferable not to unload sheep at night, but carry them on until daylight, even though the time limit expires in the night.

4. In my judgment, the operation of the twenty-eight-hour law is very beneficial.

5. With the exceptions above mentioned, I consider a strict enforcement of the present twenty-eight-hour law would better the treatment of live stock in transit.

Respectfully,

DON C. AYER,
Inspector in Charge.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Local Office, South St. Paul, Minn., May 14, 1906.

CHIEF OF BUREAU,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 10th instant, requesting my views regarding the transportation of live stock, I beg to submit the following:

It is understood that the transportation of live stock under the most favorable conditions is attended with more or less suffering. These views are based on the supposition that there is no overcrowding in transit.

1. I do not consider it inhuman to detain live stock in cars for twenty-eight hours without rest, food, and water. My observation is, when, on arrival at destination, such animals are properly fed and watered and allowed rest for a period of about twenty-four hours before slaughter, there is no injury to the meat product.

2. When animals that have been confined for a period of twenty-eight hours and can reach their destination in eight hours more, I think in many cases it is more humane to carry them direct to their destination. The loading and unloading with only five hours' rest will cause more suffering among wild cattle than the extra eight hours in the cars.

3. As it is almost impossible to unload some sheep in the night, I consider it preferable to allow them to remain in the cars until daylight.

4. In some cases which have come under my observation the enforcement of the twenty-eight-law law has been an injury to live stock in transit. Under the law it has been necessary sometimes to unload stock in small yards, where they were obliged to stand for five hours knee deep in mud and without shelter from a cold rain.

5. From a humane point of view there are other things which I consider of more importance in the transportation of live animals than the number of hours they are allowed to be confined in cars without unloading for food, water, and rest. The overcrowding of light-weight stock cattle is of common occurrence, and is often of such a degree as to cause more suffering than is caused by failure to feed and water cattle more comfortably loaded for a longer period than twenty-eight hours.

Unless dry pens are provided where the animals are sheltered from storms and from the hot sun in summer, live stock in transit will not be benefited by enforcing the twenty-eight-hour law.

Very respectfully,

F. D. KETCHUM, Inspector.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Local Office, Stock Yards Station, Kansas City, Kans., May 14, 1906.

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY: Referring to circular letter dated the 10th instant relative to the twenty-eight-hour law.

First. I do not consider it inhumane to detain live stock in cars without food, water, or rest for a period of twenty-eight consecutive hours. It is a mater of common knowledge with shippers that cattle, especially range cattle, are more or less sick after any shipment. The variable degree of fever, the constant diarrhea, and the refusal to eat or drink upon unloading all bear evidence of this. Carcasses of such animals when slaughtered do not firm well upon chilling.

Second. For a shipment of grass-fed range cattle, properly loaded, I believe it would be better to make a run of thirty-four hours, than to unload for feed and rest at expiration of twenty-eight hours, then to reload for a further six-hour run to destination, the injury the cattle sustain from unloading and reloading being greater than that inflicted by withholding rest, feed, and water for a like time. The method most satisfactory to the shipper, most humane to such cattle, and least injurious to the ultimate food product and practiced by all experienced shippers, is this: Withhold all green feed, grain, and water for the last twelve hours before loading, make a run of not less than twenty-eight hours without feed or water, and, if practicable to reach destination within an additional six hours, make the run rather than to unload and reload. Cattle shipped in this manner are not sick and have the minimum of bruises upon arrival at destination.

Third. With present equipment for lighting ordinary stock yards it is not practicable to unload or load sheep at night. It would be far more satisfactory and even humane to run sheep until daylight, than undertake to load or unload at night.

Fourth. Probably beneficial from humane standpoint.

Fifth. Not without the privilege of extending the time at the discretion of the shipper not to exceed six hours.

Very respectfully,

ALBERT DEAN,
Live Stock Agent in Charge.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,

SIR: Relative to the operation of what is known as the "twenty-eight-hour law," it is my opinion, based upon personal observation, that—

First. It is not injurious to the meat product or inhuman to detain live stock in cars for a period of twenty-eight hours without food or rest. During the summer season, when the weather is very hot, it is no doubt cruel to keep them without water for twenty-eight hours, especially cattle and hogs. This can be remedied by spraying the animals with a hose through the slats of the car and filling the troughs, provided in most cars for the purpose, with water.

Second. It is far better to keep live stock confined thirty-six hours to destination than to unload them at the expiration of twenty-eight hours. There is always a certain amount of unavoidable cruelty in loading and unloading live stock. Cattle are either very anxious to leave a car and become jammed and bruised in the doorways or they remain stubborn and are cruelly beaten and prodded by ignorant men to make them come out. The same applies to the loading.

Third. I consider it preferable to keep sheep confined in cars without food or water thirty-six hours than to unload them at night. Sheep being naturally very timid animals, especially at night, will not either eat or drink when unloaded in strange yards under cover of darkness. Sheep, due to their timidity, probably shrink more in transit than any other class of animals, and should therefore be handled as little as possible.

Fourth. Considering the matter wholly from a humane standpoint, I am of the opinion that what is popularly known as the "twenty-eight-hour law" is beneficial, as it acts as a check to those who would willfully violate the law, but I do not consider that the humane treatment of live stock in transit would be bettered by a strict enforcement of the law as it now stands. It is to the interest of owners and shippers to have their stock delivered in the best of condition and with as little shrinkage as possible. Experience has taught them that the less the stock is handled and excited the better. The five hours' rest prescribed by law is more than offset by the process of unloading and loading.

Considering the matter as a whole, I think that when modern cars are used, provided with feed racks and water troughs (most cars are so equipped), it is far better to keep live stock confined to destination, even though it take thirty-six hours, than to subject them to the unloading and loading process every twenty-eight hours at the different feeding stations. These stations are, as a rule, inadequate and give no protection against rain or snow storms. Another point why live stock should not be unloaded unless absolutely necessary is that the animals are usually very thirsty and drink too much water. The water is probably different in composition to what they have been accustomed to, and often causes violent intestinal disturbance resulting in profuse scouring and diarrhea. This trouble is aggravated by any excitement.

Very respectfully,

J. F. RYDER.

SIR: I inclose replies to questions asked with regard to the humane transportation of live stock, but have found it very difficult to answer with a simple "yes" or "no." In order for you to decide upon regulations to be imposed, a number of questions must be taken into consideration, and, in order to answer your questions intelligently, the same attention must be given to the matter by persons replying to them. I give below a few points which seem to affect the question of regulating transportation of live stock.

Animals are usually started with hay in the cars, which lasts for part of the journey.

In winter animals can go longer without water than in summer.

Sheep suffer less from deprivation of water than cattle do.

It would seem unreasonable to demand that cattle should be unloaded at a small way station for food and water when close to regular stock yards. In cases of unavoidable detention in transit some margin should be allowed, but perhaps four hours might be better than eight hours or two hours better than four hours.

The following suggestions are not made flippantly, but to draw attention to the fact that any excess of humanity shown to cattle beyond that displayed to human beings, and at the expense of the latter, may cause adverse comment.

A tramp who is more than twenty-eight hours by railroad from a town where free food and water and no necessity for work for the rest of his life await him will voluntarily place himself in a freight car and allow himself to be locked in, without food or water. Most of us would prefer that he should do this rather than ask us for transportation expenses. The cattle have had the free food and water and idleness all their lives, and we inflict upon them at the end the same suffering which the man would inflict upon himself.

In cases of military necessity soldiers may have to go more than twenty-eight hours without food or water.

The economical transportation of the tramp is a necessity, the economical transportation of the soldier may be a military necessity, and the economical transportation of the cattle is a commercial necessity. Extra expenses forced upon transportation companies must eventually be paid by the consumer in the increased price of beef.

Any increase in the price of food increases the sufferings of the poor.

In answering your letter, humanity to the cattle was the only point taken into consideration.

Very respectfully, H. N. WALLER, Inspector.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, containing questions to be answered in reference to transportation of live stock.

Taking these questions seriatim, replies are as follows:

1. No.
2. Better to unload the cattle.
3. Keep the sheep in cars until daylight.
4. The twenty-eight-hour law is beneficial.
5. Yes.

Very respectfully, H. N. WALLER, Inspector.

Dr. A. D. MELVIN,
Chief of Bureau, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your letter of May 10, 1906, propounding five questions concerning the operation of the "twenty-eight-hour law," I submit the following answers, with a general summary of reasons, based upon by observation:

Question 1: No.

Question 2: Carry them through to destination.

Question 3: During hot summer months unload during nighttime, at other seasons in daytime.

Question 4: Throughout the East, where docile and tractable native stock is handled, yes; with western range stock, no.

Question 5: No; not from a western viewpoint.

In recording the above answers I have been governed in a great measure by my observation of conditions as they prevail throughout the range territory of the West. Generally speaking, conditions in the transit of live stock, that injure the shipper financially, through shrinkage on account of unnecessary handling and the unfavorable facilities afforded for the unloading, yarding, and caring of live stock that prevails at the average stock-yard station throughout the country, makes the strict enforcement of this law more or less inhuman.

I do not say this in defense of the shipping interests, but because I sincerely believe that the methods in handling and shipping live stock which, in a general way, is most profitable from a financial standpoint is also the most humane and the least injurious to the meat product.

Very respectfully,

ALBERT E. RISHEL, Inspector.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18198) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the conferees be appointed by the Vice-President.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. WETMORE, and Mr. TILLMAN.

EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES IN THE DISTRICT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 19642) to regulate the keeping of employment agencies in the District of Columbia where fees are charged for procuring employment or situations; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill remain on the table. A similar bill is on the Calendar in the Senate. At the proper time I am going to ask that the House bill be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words in explanation of this bill. The bill, as all know, is one of considerable length. The proposition, however, is a simple one. The provisions of the bill are plain and easily understood, and the power of Congress to pass the bill is one which no one will challenge. The bill has passed the House, and it is proposed to be amended in some material matters by the Senate committee. The amendments of the committee are, in my judgment, wise ones and ones made in the public interest.

This is a bill to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal Company, a corporation having for its object, as its name implies, the construction of a ship canal between the Ohio River and Lake Erie. The route for this proposed canal is to extend from a point on the Ohio River somewhere between Beaver and Pittsburg, Pa., by way of the Ohio, Beaver, and Mahoning rivers in the State of Pennsylvania, and the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio, to a point at or near Niles, Ohio, thence by canal northwardly through the State of Ohio to an accessible harbor on Lake Erie, between the Pennsylvania and Ohio State limit and the mouth of the Grand River. The bill also provides for a branch of the canal along the Shenango River in Pennsylvania and another along the Mahoning River in Ohio.

Mr. President, the general object of the canal is apparent at a glance, but its full import and the importance of the undertaking can only be understood by considering the conditions of trade existing in the sections to be connected, the natural resources and the manufactured products of each section, and the great advantage of bringing together without transshipment and with the minimum expense for transportation of the natural products of each section. These matters have been very clearly set forth in the reports of the committees of the House and Senate which have had this matter under consideration. (House Report No. 1343 and Senate Report No. 1997.)

The canal when constructed will connect the Great Lakes system and the St. Lawrence River with the Ohio and the Mississippi rivers and their tributaries and with the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific coast when the Panama Canal shall be completed.

The importance of waterways as a means of commerce is well understood by every nation, and enormous sums of money have been expended in attempts to secure water communication for commerce with different sections of country and with the world at large. Inland cities have been given ports, thus securing to them the advantages of a location on deep water. Cities whence the tide of commerce was ebbing because of inadequate water communication have dug their way back to prosperity and commercial position. Interior rivers and lakes have been connected with each other and with the ocean to the inestimable advantage of commerce and to the development of large sections of country. Oceans have been connected, thereby changing and shortening the great routes of commerce of the world, and the United States is now engaged in the most stupendous undertaking of them all, the construction of the Panama Canal.

The reason why so much importance is attached to the waterways of a country is that it is the cheapest means of transportation known. It has been estimated that the lowest cost per ton-mile ever attained in this country is about 3½ to 4 mills per ton-mile, the average charge by all railroads of the country being nearly 9 mills per ton-mile. Water transportation is easily one-sixth to one-eighth as cheap.

Because of the importance of this means of transportation, the United States exercises particular care in its control of the navigable waters, regulating the height and character of the bridges to be constructed, and preventing obstructions to navigation generally, and Congress annually appropriates large sums of money for river and harbor improvements.

It is particularly fitting, therefore, that the National Government should, by the granting of the charter requested, receive and assume the control over this important factor of interstate commerce, which so intimately concerns the welfare and prosperity of large sections of this country.

The Pittsburg district to-day moves an annual tonnage greater than the cities of New York, London, Antwerp, Hamburg, and Liverpool combined, and greater than New York, Boston, Baltimore, and Chicago combined. In assessed wealth, Allegheny County alone exceeds every State in the Union except thirteen. The reason for this is its natural advantages. Located on a navigable river, and the center of the coal and coke producing sections of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia, it could not be less than a great manufacturing district. But Pittsburg is at a disadvantage in one respect. Its iron ore comes from the mines of the Northwest, a large portion of which must come by rail from Lake Erie to Pittsburg. The Northwest, on the other hand, requires and receives almost an equal tonnage of coal and coke. Thus the two sections of country require mutually the products of the other. Pennsylvania and Ohio require the ore and grain products of the Northwest, and the Northwest requires the coal and coke and manufactured products of these and adjoining States.

Ideal conditions for the development of commerce and manufacture are approximated in the degree that these natural products can be brought together with the least inconvenience and at the least expense. As has already been stated, the cost of transportation by rail from Lake Erie to Pittsburg is from six to eight times what it is estimated it would be by water. With this canal, wheat and iron ore and other products of the Northwest could be placed on a vessel at Duluth, or any other port on the Great Lakes, and carried without reshipment to Pittsburg, or any other place on the Ohio or Mississippi rivers and their tributaries where navigation permits. Twenty-four States will thus be connected, and an interchange of natural products and manufactures made possible at a minimum cost for transportation.

Cheaper transportation means cheaper and better living for the people in the sections affected thereby. Cheaper cost of living and cheaper natural products mean cheaper manufactured products, and cheaper manufactured products means growth in trade and commerce and in the material wealth of the country. And not only does it mean prosperity for the manufacturing interests, but the agricultural and mining and lumbering interests of the country are likewise benefited. To them it means a market for their products, and in return cheaper coal and coke and manufactured articles. Thus all sections affected by the canal will be mutually benefited thereby.

The cheapening of the cost of transportation is the greatest factor in commercial expansion, and it is therefore a matter of highest wisdom on the part of State, municipal, or National Government to afford every proper encouragement and facility to that end. This is universally recognized. The State of New York a few years ago appropriated $100,000,000 to deepen the Erie Canal to 12 feet, and thus secure better and cheaper transportation from the Great Lakes to the ocean. Many cities have made large expenditures for similar purposes. Chicago has spent over $38,000,000 in her drainage canal, which is a portion of a canal designed to connect that city with the Mississippi River. Glasgow expended $60,000,000 in digging her way out to the sea by way of the Clyde. Liverpool expended $106,000,000 on improvements at the mouth of the Mersey River, and the United States expends millions of dollars annually in river and harbor improvements, and it also assisted in the construction of the Pacific railroads. So the National Government stands committed to the policy of encouraging in every way it can efforts to cheapen the cost of transportation.

The proposed canal is a work of great national importance, devoted entirely, or at least very largely, to interstate commerce, and therefore is one which should be under the control of Congress. The United States has not yet, and it is to be hoped that it never will be necessary for it to embark upon a policy of national construction and ownership of the great agencies of interstate commerce. Nor can it engage in any such undertaking unless such ownership is essential or necessary for the proper and effective exercise of its power to regulate commerce. The interest the United States has in such matters is the regulation of the commerce, and this can very easily be accomplished, at least so far as new interstate carriers are concerned, by the means suggested by the pending bill—that is, by allowing such carriers to secure national charters and retaining to itself such powers of control and regulation as are deemed expedient. This is better than government ownership. It involves no expenditure of money, no annoying perplexities of construction and management, and secures to the Government every feature of control that may be deemed essential or desirable.

True the United States is now engaged in the construction of the Panama Canal, but it is apparent that it could not undertake very many enterprises of the same kind at the same time. That is to be an international highway, and for reasons of highest governmental policy and protection it is obvious that the United States was practically compelled to engage in that undertaking.

Already the difficulties are manifest, to say nothing of the enormous expense involved. The construction of this canal will engage the attention of the National Government for many years to come, and there is no probability that the United States would desire to undertake the construction of the canal now in question. Clearly, therefore, if this canal is to be constructed at all, or in the near future, it must be done by private enterprise. It is a matter of importance, however, that the National Government should at its inception assume and exercise all needed control.

This is precisely what is contemplated by the incorporation of this company, to give to Congress the absolute control of the situation, so far as it is deemed necessary or desirable, and to create and vest in the company such powers, and such powers only, as are necessary and expedient for it to have.

It means the taking control of a great factor of interstate commerce in its incipient stages and fashioning and limiting its powers to meet the views of Congress and the legitimate needs of the country, instead of allowing it to spring into existence under State authority and outside of the control of Congress, except so far as it may be subject to general legislation upon the subject of interstate commerce.

Mr. President, at this time, when almost an entire session of Congress has been devoted to the passage of laws seeking to gain control over interstate carriers, this argument should apply with peculiar force. In these times, when great aggregations of capital, the creations of State authority, threaten and bid defiance to Federal control, and the utmost energies of Congress are devoted to securing a measure of control, it would seem to be an act of highest wisdom for Congress to outline in the initial stages the scope of the powers to be conferred upon such carriers, and to retain all needed powers for their regulation and control, without trusting to the efficacy of a statute of general application, hampered by constitutional restrictions, in order to obtain and enforce such control.

In the present instance we have an aggregation of capital seeking a Federal charter for the purpose of carrying out an enterprise of great national importance. Not a dollar of national funds is asked for. Private enterprise will assume the whole cost of the undertaking and the difficulties. It offers to the United States a national control, including the regulation of the rates to be charged, and in return asks only for a Federal charter, allowing such powers as should properly and of necessity belong to it.

The bill has been favorably reported by the committees of both Houses and extensively amended to cover every reasonable objection. The company is to exercise the right of eminent domain in conformity with and subject to the laws of the States through which it is to be constructed; the taking of water from rivers, lakes, brooks, streams, etc., for the use of the canal is to be subject to the rights of the States through which it passes and of the municipalities affected thereby, and the act provides that nothing contained in the bill shall authorize the company to impair the navigability of any rivers or streams, or to diminish at any time the water supply of any city, village, or municipality below the normal minimum discharge of any such river or stream; and in the matter of taxation, the company is made subject to the laws of the respective States in which it does business, regulating the taxation of foreign corporations.

As to the power of Congress to create such a corporation as a means of regulating interstate commerce, there can be no doubt. A similar question arose in the case of Luxton v. The North River Bridge Company (153 U. S., 525) over the constitutionality of the act of Congress of July 11, 1890 (ch. 669, 26 Stat. L., 268), incorporating the North River Bridge Company. The court sustained the constitutionality of that act and affirmed the power of Congress to exercise the right of eminent domain whenever this is necessary for the accomplishment of any object within its authority, and with or without a concurrent act of the State in which the lands lie, Mr. Justice Gray saying (p. 529) that the validity of the act rested "upon principles of constitutional law now established beyond dispute."

Mr. President, I will say, in conclusion, that in addition to the safeguards which have been thrown around this bill by the amendments provided in the Senate there is a distinct provision that not a stroke of work upon the canal shall be done until all of the plans have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KNOX. I have finished.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before the Senator resumes his seat, I should like to have him state, if he has not already stated, the length of this proposed canal in miles.

Mr. KNOX. About 150 miles.

Mr. SPOONER. How much?

Mr. KNOX. About 150 miles from the nearest point on Lake Erie to a point between the mouth of the Allegheny River and the mouth of the Beaver.

Mr. BACON. Does that include lateral canals?

Mr. KNOX. It does not include lateral canals.

Mr. BACON. How much, including them?

Mr. KNOX. There is nothing in the report or nothing in the testimony which indicates that. The lateral canals, I should imagine, would be half the distance of the whole canal. I judge that from my knowledge of the geography of the country, as it is described in the bill.

Mr. BACON. About 75 miles?

Mr. KNOX. I should say all the lateral canals would not exceed in length 75 miles.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the Senator resumes his seat, I desire to make an inquiry of him.

Mr. President, Congress chartered the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, which was proposed to be constructed through several States. Among others it crossed the State of Texas. The railroad commission of that State, in 1891, undertook to fix rates of freight for that railroad company for freight which was transported between points wholly within the State. The company attacked the action of the commission on the ground that it was chartered by Federal authority and was not subject to regulation of freight charges by the State even between points wholly within the State. In one of the Reagan cases reported in 154 United States, the one in which the Texas and Pacific Railway Company was a party, the Supreme Court considered that question and held that that company as to intra-State freight was subject to State authority.

The justice who delivered the opinion, however, Mr. Justice Brewer, suggested that if Congress had seen proper it might possibly have conferred such power upon the Texas and Pacific Railway Company as would have taken from the State the authority to regulate freight wholly within its limits, but left the question undetermined. What I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania after this explanation, is what provision there is in this bill on that subject, if any; that is to say, is the power reserved to Congress to regulate and control the rates on freight which will be transported between points entirely within a State?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, in the most careful way that has been provided for by a Senate amendment.

That Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the tolls——

Mr. CULBERSON. What amendment is that?

Mr. KNOX. It is section 9. I am reading from the sixth page of the bill—to regulate the tolls, fares, and rates to be charged by said company for the use of said canals; and the said company and the said canals and all transportation thereon—

Not interstate transportation—

shall be subject to all the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts supplemental thereto and amendatory thereof, now or hereafter enacted.

And then there is a more general provision in the latter part of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the Senator's attention, if I do not misunderstand this provision, to the fact that the provision which he has read gives Congress power to regulate the intrastate freight of this canal.

Mr. KNOX. No; it gives the power to regulate all transportation upon the canal.

Mr. CULBERSON. That would include intrastate freight.

Mr. KNOX. Certainly; and that is the idea. The idea was to put this canal absolutely, in consideration of its receiving from the Congress of the United States a charter, under Federal control in respect to every particle of business that it does.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator, as I understand him then, takes the position that Congress has the power to regulate freight carried wholly within the limits of the State by a Federal corporation.

Mr. KNOX. I take the position that Congress has the right to regulate anything that a corporation which it creates does by virtue of that charter.

Mr. CULBERSON. But, Mr. President, Congress has no power to charter this company except to regulate interstate commerce, and consequently if its power to charter a company is limited to its power to regulate interstate rates, how can it by chartering the company extend its authority to the regulation of intrastate rates?

Mr. KNOX. I think there can be no doubt of the proposition that if Congress has the power to charter a corporation, to bring it into life, to give it all of its power and vitality under a provision of the Constitution which permits it to regulate commerce between the States, it follows that because of the power of creation it controls everything that that corporation may do. The corporation is not bound to take a charter out under the laws of the United States, but if it does take a charter out under the laws of the United States it may in all respects be made subject to the laws of the United States and the will of the United States by the act of its creation.

Mr. CULBERSON. But, Mr. President, I submit to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the power in Congress is limited to a specific grant in the Constitution, which is to regulate rates of freight which is carried from one State to another or from this country to foreign countries.

Its authority to grant such a charter as this rests upon its authority to regulate such foreign and interstate commerce, and it can not, by granting a charter, exceed its constitutional authority to regulate interstate freight. If that is the proposition which the Senator will insist upon in the passage of this bill, Mr. President, some of us, at least, will be denied the pleasure of supporting it.

Before I take my seat I wish to ask the Senator another question, and I rose simply to make these inquiries of the Senator.

Section 10 of this bill—and that is the only section I have had an opportunity to read—provides for the construction of a number of lateral or branch canals, as I believe they are called. What I desire to ask the Senator is if the construction of these canals will create parallel and competing lines either among themselves or with the main line, so that if this authority is granted a certain territory will be monopolized by this company for the carriage of freight?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to answer the Senator from Texas on that point. I am somewhat familiar with the bill, because it was reported by the Committee on Commerce, and that committee largely amended the bill. The other canals that are referred to in the bill are simply small feeders. They are not lateral canals. They are not intended to cover independent territory, but rather as feeders to this canal to bring in traffic by side lines to the main line. The main object is to reach certain coal fields of Pennsylvania and Ohio and bring that coal in those canals into the main canal.

Mr. CULBERSON. An inquiry was made by another Senator a moment ago as to the length of the branch or lateral canals, and I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania, though I may have misunderstood him, to say that he was not able to give the length of these lateral or branch canals.

Mr. KNOX. I can answer only from my knowledge of the geography of that country. If it is an important question, I would not want you to rely upon any answer that I would make without some examination.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator will permit me, the matter in my mind, though it may not be important if I knew all the facts, is whether or not the construction of these branch canals will amount to the construction of parallel waterways for the transportation of freight, so that a considerable portion of country, so far as the carriage of freight is concerned, will be monopolized by this corporation.

Mr. KNOX. I can not answer that question accurately. It would not create any such condition as the Senator has described. I know that from the description of the streams along which the lateral canals are to be built.

Then I want to add to the answer I made a moment ago to the Senator from Texas. The Senator has raised an entirely new question in connection with the ninth section and the power of Congress to regulate the entirely local freight. I do not want to feel that I am myself committed by the answer I have made, but I do not see how, in any event, it is deprived of it because, after all, that is a question for construction by the courts.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the Senator resumes his seat, I wish to say that the trouble is that the language of this bill brings it within the rule which the justice declared in the Reagan case that Congress might do. For my part, I do not believe Congress possesses the power to regulate intrastate commerce, even though the instrumentality of that commerce is created by Congress. I sincerely hope, if that question is presented to the court, that the court will not decide according to the intimation of the justice. But even if Congress possesses that power, I never want to see it exercised. So, following the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON], it seems that if the Senator from Pennsylvania would confine this authority to interstate and foreign commerce, then he would bring this law within the rule laid down in the Reagan case, in which it was held that it was not the intention of Congress to remove it from the regulation of interstate commerce, and the Senator might escape the serious question as to the validity of his bill in the court, for if this amendment remains in it and the court should finally decide, as I think the court ought, that under the power to regulate commerce Congress can not create a corporation for any purpose except the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, and that when Congress attempts to create a corporation as a means of regulating intrastate commerce it exceeds its authority, then this bill, expressing a different rule, might be subject to a serious constitutional objection.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to make a suggestion, which I think will solve the difficulty?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. After the word "regulate," on page 6, section 9, line 13, I suggest that there be inserted the words "as to interstate commerce;" so as to read:

That Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate, as to interstate commerce, the tolls, fares, and rates to be charged, etc.

Mr. BAILEY. Make it "interstate and foreign commerce."

Mr. NELSON. Very well; "interstate and foreign commerce." I think the Senator from Pennsylvania will have no objection to that provision.

Mr. KNOX. Not the slightest in the world. I only want to add—and I think I am entitled to add, in justice to myself—that I have had nothing whatever to do in the preparation of this bill; I did not even appear before the committee in its interest; and, in fact, had not read it until within the last few days, when we expected to bring the bill up. That was the reason I was so free to disavow the accuracy of my own answer. I think the suggestion, however, made by the Senator from Texas corrects that entirely.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to Senators that when that amendment in the bill is reached, I will move to add the amendment which I have indicated, if it be agreeable to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Entirely so.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the remaining part of section 9 needs correction also, where it reads, beginning with line 14:

And the said company and the said canals and all transportation thereon shall be subject to all the provisions of an act entitled, etc.

Mr. KNOX. It should read "all transportation aforesaid."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Texas that we can make an amendment there to harmonize with the other amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have no prepared speech to make upon this measure, but I desire to say that I earnestly hope the Senate will pass this bill. It is a novelty in legislation. Congress is importuned at every session to pass enormous river and harbor bills for internal improvements. Here is a proposition before this body which involves an internal improvement of a waterway perhaps more far-reaching and important than was ever provided for in a river and harbor bill, and entirely by private enterprise. Not one dollar is asked from the Federal Government to construct this canal, some 100 miles in length, connecting over twenty-four States by a 12-foot waterway—the New England States and the Northwest as far as the great State represented by the Senator from Michigan.

The gentlemen who have applied for this charter of incorporation are not making the application on any speculation. They do not ask this privilege from Congress for the purpose of hawking this act around for syndicates and banks. The act provides that they must pay 10 per cent of the authorized capital within three years in the actual construction of this work, and the probabilities are that the canal will be finished within ten years, thereby adding enormously to the industrial prosperity of Pittsburg and western Pennsylvania, and enabling the ores and farm products of the great States bordering upon the Great Lakes to be brought to the great industrial centers at the head of the Ohio River.

The bill has been most carefully amended by the Senate Committee on Commerce, of which I happen to be a member, largely owing to the fidelity and care with which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] scrutinized the measure, who has inserted, as the Senate will observe, almost every provision which can be imagined to safeguard the Government and the patrons of the canal in line with all the recent thoughts that have been developed in reference to common carriers in the discussion in connection with the railroad rate bill.

The only possible objection that can be made to this bill is the technical one that perhaps Congress has not the power to pass an act of incorporation of this character. It is contended, however, that such authority does exist, and it is evident that if authority does exist this case is beyond all others a proper one for its exercise, as it pertains to the great internal waterway improvements in the country.

It was originally contemplated that the Government should have the right to take possession of this canal within fifty years. The Senate committee struck out that provision, not at the request of the gentlemen having this enterprise in charge, but because the committee did not want to pledge the Government in any way to take possession of the work. But I have no doubt—and I do not think any member of the Senate Committee on Commerce has any doubt—that ultimately this waterway will be controlled and owned by the United States Government. I repeat, it will be 12 feet in depth, a depth similar to that in the Erie Canal, for which the State of New York has appropriated $100,000,000, and will put the manufactured products of Pittsburg and the industrial establishments at the head of the Ohio—the oil, the coal, the iron, and the steel—within the reach of New England, and bring their products in return to that section and to the mouth of the Mississippi.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon an inquiry?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what good reason there is why this enterprise should not be chartered by the State of Pennsylvania instead of by the United States?

Mr. PENROSE. The reasons are twofold, Mr. President. One reason is that this is a matter which peculiarly should come under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. It involves the taking of water from great waterways; it involves intruding upon waterways and encroaching upon the Great Lakes and headwaters of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; it applies to interstate commerce; and there is no legislation either at Harrisburg or at Columbus, and such legislation can not be obtained except after great effort and after a long series of years, which would enable such an incorporation to be made successfully and to be successfully carried out. It would be very difficult to bring about such a union of action between the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania as would render this a practical proposition.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me—I do not know that I understood him correctly—did I understand him to say that it would take a number of years to get such a charter from the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. PENROSE. There are no laws on the statute book of Pennsylvania covering all the questions which arise under this bill and no such laws in the State of Ohio. It would require a separate effort in both States to cover all the points raised and the questions involved. This is a simple and direct method and the most expeditious. As the question involves the waterways of the United States and as the work will unquestionably be some day owned by the Government, there is thought to be ample justification for the application to Congress in this case.

I repeat, the bill has been most carefully amended and the canal will be commenced at once. I for one, in view of the ceaseless efforts from localities all over the country to get help from Congress, contend that this enterprise—a private effort, involving the expenditure of many millions of dollars—should be encouraged by the prompt and favorable action of this body.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the measure, in view of the fact that this proposed canal is to pass through Ohio and that it is to be a canal connecting Lake Erie with Pittsburg, it is proper, perhaps, that I should say a word about it.

When this bill was introduced I had some misgiving as to the power of Congress to incorporate, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, such a company as this, but after having examined the authorities I find that there are at least dicta to the effect that Congress, in the exercise of the power conferred by the commerce clause of the Constitution, has power to create corporations to carry out such enterprises as this.

The only objection I had to this measure at any time was as to the question of power. Accepting these dicta as settling that question, it seems to me there is no good reason, under all the circumstances attending this proposition, why this bill should not pass. It will certainly be a very beneficial help to the commerce that it is intended to accommodate to have such a canal constructed and put into operation as this bill authorizes this company to construct and operate. Therefore, without detaining the Senate at this late hour to add to the arguments which have been made by the Senators from Pennsylvania, I want to express my desire to see the measure enacted.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senators who have this bill in charge if they desire that it shall be voted on to-night?

Mr. KNOX. So far as I am personally concerned, I will say that I think the longer Senators examine this bill the better they will like it and the fewer objections, I think, they will see in it. I should not, however, myself like it to lose any parliamentary position which it possesses. It will, of course, be subject to the will of the Senate in that respect.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to delay the Senators having the bill in charge, nor the Senate, if it desires that there shall be a vote on it. So far as I am concerned, however, I have not had my doubts settled, as has the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], as to the power of the Government to authorize the building of this canal. I certainly can not subscribe to the doctrine announced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that the Government of the United States can control the entire commerce on this canal—the commerce starting in the State of Ohio and ending in the State of Ohio, or starting in Pennsylvania and ending in Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if Congress has got the power to do that——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Colorado probably was not attending at the time it was agreed among us that that proposition need not be involved here, by eliminating from the bill the provision that the control should be over all commerce and limiting it simply to commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the bill might be so framed as on its face it would not claim that. I do not believe the courts would ever hold that we could have control over commerce of the character mentioned. Yet if on the face of the bill it is plainly apparent that we have that power, that might at some time be a very persuasive argument before the court. The court might think Congress had determined that question, although, of course, it would not bind the court.

I do not believe there is any necessity for a charter by the General Government to build this canal. I myself regret very much that there seems to be a growing idea that a charter from the General Government can be had for any kind of an enterprise. I have not the slightest doubt that in the next five or ten years we shall see endeavors made to get Federal charters to carry out ordinary commercial and manufacturing affairs, upon the theory, I suppose, that they are going to export the goods at some time to Europe, to Canada, or elsewhere.

The reason the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] gives as to the necessity for a charter from the General Government, it seems to me, is not a very strong one. Ohio has chartered railroads that have passed out of Ohio into Pennsylvania, and Pennsylvania has chartered railroads that have passed out of Pennsylvania into Ohio. The States do that. I do not mean to say that Pennsylvania may charter a railroad in Ohio——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. But there has never been any difficulty—in a moment I will yield to the Senator—in arranging the matter in such way that when a railroad reached another State line it could secure the privilege of entering that State. Now, I will hear what the Senator wants to say.

Mr. PENROSE. The point I made is that neither Pennsylvania nor Ohio has canal legislation as compared with their railroad legislation. There is ample legislation in both States providing for every contingency that may arise in connection with railroads; but neither State has any legislation of any account in connection with canals. It was found that the questions that would arise were so complicated and numerous if a State charter were attempted that, unless both States could be got to work in conjunction to enact legislation—which would obviously be somewhat difficult, as the legislatures may meet in different years and meet separately—it was thought this was the most expeditious, convenient, and best way, and that there was justification for it, as I have said, because it involved great waterways that ultimately would become the property of the United States Government.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to call the Senator's attention to one of the dicta to which I referred a moment ago as leading me to the conclusion that this was within the power of Congress. In 127 United States Reports, Mr. Justice Bradley said, in the case of California v. Pacific Railroad Company:

> It can not at the present day be doubted that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, as well as to provide for postal accommodations and military exigencies, had authority to pass these laws.

Now, I say that was purely dicta, and I do not like to base a conclusion upon dicta; but dicta similar to that have appeared in other cases. Some other justices, in decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States—just what they would decide were a question to come before the court on that particular point I do not know—but, in so far as they have given any indication, it is to the effect that they would hold that, under the power to regulate commerce, Congress has the power to incorporate a company to construct a railroad or a canal to engage in interstate commerce. It has never seemed to me to be quite clear upon reason that such a conclusion could be deduced from that provision; but I yield to what seems to be the trend of the expressions on that subject.

That is the only trouble I have had at any time in regard to this proposed legislation; and, in view of the comment the Senator made—which I thought was entirely justified, because I had great difficulty about it—I felt as though I wanted to call attention—and I thank him for allowing me to do so—to the quotation that I had in mind.

Mr. TELLER. I have not had the opportunity of reading this bill, except since I came into the Chamber within the last ten minutes. I see some things in it that I do not understand, and there are some things in it that I think might be changed very properly; but I am not prepared to go on at this time. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has this bill in charge, if he has any objection to allowing the bill to go over until opportunity may be had to examine into it more closely. I do not myself intend to take up any time on this subject, but I should like to look at the bill. Possibly I might be induced to vote for it, but I really do not see how I could with my present opinions.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will let the bill go over. I wish to say a word or two with reference to it; but it is rather late this evening, and we have had a somewhat arduous day.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Chair—because I have no knowledge upon the subject—what will be the parliamentary position with respect to this bill in the morning?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go to the Calendar, and can be taken up by unanimous consent or upon motion.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up after the routine business is over to-morrow morning. My colleague is to leave the city in a few days, and is very anxious to have the bill disposed of, as I am.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say that I have no desire to delay the bill. I should like at least to read it over before I am called upon to vote on it. I confess that I ought to have done that before; but I have had other things to do. I do not object to the suggestion made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] asks unanimous consent that the pending bill may be taken up immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer two amendments to the bill called up by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I ask to have them printed in the RECORD, that they may be looked over by members of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin that the proposed amendments be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. GALLINGER. And also printed in the usual form.

Mr. PENROSE. And printed in the usual form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be printed in the usual form and also printed in the RECORD in the absence of objection.

The amendments referred to are as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce, viz: On page 13, after line 13, insert a new section, to read as follows:

SEC. —. It shall be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and determine the true fair value of the said canal, canals, property, and appurtenances thereto belonging and used, or to be used, for the convenience of the public. Such investigation shall be commenced as soon as any work on the said canal is undertaken and shall continue as improvements are made and contracts are given. For the purpose of such investigation, the Commission is authorized to employ such engineers, experts, and other assistants as may be necessary. The canal company, or any construction company or other person, firm, or corporation engaged in the construction of the said canals or works or any parts thereof, shall furnish to the Commission, from time to time, and as the Commission may require, maps, profiles, contracts, reports of engineers, and other documents, records, and papers, or copies of any or all of the same, in aid of such investigation and determination of the value of the said canals, property, and appurtenances.

The Commission shall thereafter, in like manner, keep itself informed of all extensions and improvements or other changes in the condition of the property of the said canal and ascertain the fair value thereof, and from time to time, as may be required for the regulation of tolls, charges, and services under the provisions of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, revise and correct its valuation of the property of the said canal company. To enable the Commission to make such valuation and such changes and corrections in its valuation, the said canal company is required to report currently to the Commission, and as the Commission may require, all improvements and changes in its property and to file with the Commission copies of all contracts for such improvements at the time the same are executed.

Whenever the Commission shall have completed the valuation of the property, or any part thereof, and before said valuation shall be recorded as finally determined by said Commission, the Commission shall give notice by registered letter to the said canal company, stating the valuation placed upon the said canals, appurtenances, or parts thereof used, or to be used, for the convenience of the public, and shall allow the company twenty days in which to file a protest of the same with the Commission. If no protest is filed within twenty days, such valuation shall be made a matter of record by the Commission.

If notice of contest is filed by the said canal company, the Commission shall fix a time for hearing the same, and shall proceed as promptly as may be to hear and consider any matter relative and material thereto presented by the said company in support of its protest so filed as aforesaid. If after hearing any contest of such valuation, under the provisions of this act, the Commission is of the opinion that its valuation is incorrect, it shall correct the same and determine a fair valuation of such property, and shall make such determination a matter of record in the office of the Commission. All such valuations by the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the fair value of the said canals, property, and appurtenances in any proceedings under the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and in all proceedings which may be instituted for the purchase of the said canals, property, and appurtenances by the United States.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce, viz: After line 5, page 4, insert the following:

Provided further, That the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal Company, its successors and assigns, shall issue only such amounts of stocks and bonds, coupon notes, and other evidences of indebtedness payable at periods of more than twelve months after the date thereof as the Interstate Commerce Commission may from time to time determine is reasonably necessary for the purpose for which such issue of stock or bonds has been authorized. And the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and empowered and it shall be its duty to determine, upon application, what issues of stocks, bonds, coupon notes, or other evidences of indebtedness may be reasonably necessary to pay the cost of construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of said canals and works. Said Commission shall render a decision, upon an application for such issue, within thirty days after final hearing thereon, which decision shall be in writing, shall assign the reasons therefor, and shall, if authorizing such issue, specify the respective amounts of stocks or bonds or of coupon notes or of other evidences of indebtedness as aforesaid which are authorized to be issued for the respective purposes to which the proceeds thereof are to be applied. Such decision shall be filed in the office of the Commission, and a certified copy of such decision shall be delivered to the said canal company, which shall cause the same to be entered upon its records before any stocks, bonds, coupon notes, or other evidences of indebtedness thereby authorized are issued. Every certificate of stock, every bond, and other evidence of indebtedness of such canal company operating as a lien upon the property of such company which shall be made, issued, or sold without compliance with this act shall be void. Any officer or director of said canal company who shall knowingly make any false statement or shall withhold from the Interstate Commerce Commission any information requested by such Commission to procure the approval of said Commission to any issue of stocks, or bonds, or coupon notes, or other evidences of indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the United States district court of the district in which such offense is committed shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not less than two nor more than ten years, and shall likewise be liable to any creditor of such company for the full amount of damages sustained by such wrongful act.

MONUMENT ON KINGS MOUNTAIN BATTLE GROUND.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 17083) providing for the erection of a monument on Kings Mountain battle ground commemorative of the great victory gained there during the war of the American Revolution on October 7, 1780, by the American forces.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall not object to this bill, but after it has been acted on I shall ask to act on a House bill now on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $30,000 for the erection of a monument and inclosure for the same on Kings Mountain battle ground, in York County, S. C.

Mr. OVERMAN. After the word "Shelby," in line 1, on page 2, I move to insert "Charles McDowell."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. On page 2, line 10, I move to strike out "Battle Ground" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Centennial."

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "Mountain," it is proposed to strike out "Battle Ground" and insert "Centennial;" so as to read:

The Kings Mountain Centennial Association of South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to call up from the table the bill (H. R. 19642) to regulate the keeping of employment agencies in the District of Columbia where fees are charged for procuring employment or situations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The bill was read the second time at length.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate has given this matter very careful consideration, and there is on the Calendar a similar Senate bill. I venture to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 6394) to regulate the keeping of employment agencies in the District of Columbia where fees are charged for procuring employment or situations was indefinitely postponed.

CITIZENS' BANK OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. McENERY. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1816) for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana $215,820.89, for a claim found due said bank by the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALASKA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Calendar the bill (S. 6358) to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph and telephone line in the district of Alaska.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether this is the bill which was reported from the Committee on Territories?

Mr. BURNHAM. It is substantially the same bill. There are certain amendments.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Is it the same bill which was under consideration here a few weeks ago?

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes; reported from the Committee on Territories on the 9th of February. It is the same bill, with some minor amendments.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. At the time the bill was up in the Senate there was some discussion about it, and I think there are some objections to it.

Mr. BURNHAM. The bill was read at that time, and I only wish to have the bill read now, so that it will not have to be read again.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understood that the bill was read at the time it was up before.

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes; but there are some amendments.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I shall have to object to the passage of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed.

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to have the bill read.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not object to the reading of it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read.

Mr. BURNHAM. This is a new draft. It was read in substance before, and these amendments are minor amendments. This bill was reported to conform to the bill as it came from the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read in full.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I present a conference report on the statehood bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the report be printed, and that it lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12707) "to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 9, 10, 12, 14, 15, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, and 39, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert: "and the governor, the chief justice, and the secretary of the Territory of Oklahoma shall appoint an election commissioner who shall establish voting precincts in said Osage Indian Reservation, and shall appoint the judges for election in said Osage Indian Reservation;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "each of said districts" and insert "said Osage district;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After "President" strike out "who;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "and shall not be changed therefrom previous to anno Domini nineteen hundred and thirteen, but said capital shall, after said year, be located by the electors of said State at an election to be provided for by the legislature: Provided, however, That the legislature of said State, except as shall be necessary for the convenient transaction of the public business of said State at said capital, shall not appropriate any public moneys of the State for the erection of buildings for capitol purposes during such period;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "or in which the United States maintained laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"Where any part of the lands granted by this act to the State of Oklahoma are valuable for minerals, which term shall also include gas and oil, such lands shall not be sold by the said State prior to January first, nineteen hundred and fifteen; but the same may be leased for periods not exceeding five years by the State officers duly authorized for that purpose, such leasing to be made by public competition after not less than thirty days' advertisement in the manner to be prescribed by law, and all such leasing shall be done under sealed bids and awarded to the highest responsible bidder. The leasing shall require and the advertisement shall specify in each case a fixed royalty to be paid by the successful bidder, in addition to any bonus offered for the lease, and all proceeds from leases shall be covered into the fund to which they shall properly belong, and no transfer or assignment of any lease shall be valid or confer any right in the assignee without the consent of the proper State authorities in writing: Provided, however, That agricultural lessees in possession of such lands shall be reimbursed by the mining lessees for all damage done to said agricultural lessees' interest therein by reason of such mining operations. The legislature of the State may prescribe additional legislation governing such leases not in conflict herewith."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 23. That the inhabitants of all that part of the area of the United States now constituting the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, as at present described, may become the State of Arizona, as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 24. That at the general election to be held on the 6th day of November, 1906, all the electors of said Territories, respectively, qualified to vote at such election, are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form a convention for said Territories. The aforesaid convention shall consist of one hundred and ten delegates, sixty-six of which delegates shall be elected to said convention by the people of the Territory of New Mexico and forty-four by the people of the Territory of Arizona; and the governors, chief justices, and secretaries of each of said Territories, respectively, shall apportion the delegates to be thus elected from their respective Territories, as nearly as may be, equitably among the several counties thereof in accordance with the voting population as shown by the vote cast for Delegate in Congress in the respective Territories in nineteen hundred and four.

"That at the said general election and on the same ballots on which the names of candidates to the convention aforesaid are printed, there shall be submitted to said qualified electors of each of said Territories a question which shall be stated on the ballot in substance and form as follows:

"'Shall Arizona and New Mexico be united to form one State?'"

Yes. ☐ ☐ No.

"Electors desiring to vote in the affirmative shall place a cross mark in the square to the left of the word "Yes," and those desiring to vote in the negative shall place a cross mark in the square to the left of the word "No" in the form above prescribed. The governors and secretaries of the respective Territories shall certify and transmit, as soon as may be practicable, the results of said election each to the other and likewise to the Secretary of the Interior, and if it appears from the returns thus certified that a majority of the qualified electors in each of said Territories who voted on the question aforesaid at such election voted in favor of the union of New Mexico and Arizona as one State, then, and not otherwise, the inhabitants of that part of the area of the United States now constituting the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico as at present described may become the State of Arizona as hereinafter provided; but if in either of said Territories a majority of the qualified electors voting on the question aforesaid at such election shall appear by such certified returns to have voted against the union of said Territories then, and in that event, section 23 and all succeeding sections of this act shall thereafter be null and void and of no effect, excepting that the appropriation made in section 41 hereof shall be and remain available for defraying all and every kind and character of expense incurred on account of the election of delegates to the convention and the submission of the question aforesaid.

"The governors of said Territories, respectively, shall, within thirty days after the approval of this act, by proclamation in which the aforesaid apportionment of delegates to the convention shall be fully specified and announced and the aforesaid question to be voted on by the electors shall be clearly stated, order that the delegates aforesaid in their respective Territories shall be voted for and the question aforesaid shall be submitted to the qualified electors in each of said Territories as herein required at the aforesaid general election. Such election for delegates shall be conducted, the returns made, and the certificates of persons elected to such convention issued, as near as may be, in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territories, respectively, regulating elections therein of members of the legislature: Provided, That if it appears from the returns that a majority of the qualified electors in the Territory of Arizona who voted on the question at the election voted in favor of the union of New Mexico and Arizona as one State, then, and not otherwise, the secretary or other proper officer of said Territory of Arizona into whose hands the result of said election finally comes, shall immediately transmit and certify the result as to the election of delegates to the convention to the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico, at Santa Fe, and if it appears from the returns from the election held in New Mexico that a majority of the qualified voters aforesaid voted in favor of joint statehood, then in that event the secretary of said Territory of New Mexico shall make up a temporary roll of the convention from the certified returns from both of said Territories, and he shall call the convention to order at the time herein required, and said convention when so called to order and organized shall be the sole judge of the election and qualifications of its own members. Persons possessing the qualifications entitling them to vote at the aforesaid general election shall be entitled to vote on the ratification or rejection of the constitution, if submitted to the people of said Terriories hereunder, and on the election of all officials whose election is taking place at the same time, under such rules or regulations as said convention may prescribe, not in conflict with this act.

SEC. 25. That if a majority in each of said Territories at the election aforesaid shall vote for joint statehood, and not otherwise, the delegates to the convention thus elected shall meet in the hall of the house of representatives of the Territory of New Mexico, in the city of Santa Fe therein, at twelve o'clock noon on Monday, December third, nineteen hundred and six, but they shall not receive compensation for more than sixty days of service, and after organization shall declare on behalf of the people of said proposed State that they adopt the Constitution of the United States, whereupon the said convention shall be, and is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said proposed State. The constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. And said convention shall provide, by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; and that polygamous or plural marriages and the sale, barter, or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians are forever prohibited.

"Second. That the people inhabiting said proposed State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated and ungranted public lands lying within the boundaries thereof and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes, except as hereinafter provided, and that until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States the same shall be and remain subject to the disposition of the United States, and such Indian lands shall remain under the absolute jurisdiction and control of the Congress of the United States; that the lands and other property belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed at a higher rate than the lands and other property belonging to residents thereof; that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States or reserved for its use; but nothing herein, or in the ordinance herein provided for, shall preclude the said State from taxing, as other lands and other property are taxed, any lands and other property owned or held by any Indian who has severed his tribal relations and has obtained from the United States or from any person a title thereto by patent or other grant, save and except such lands as have been or may be granted to any Indian or Indians under any act of Congress containing a provision exempting the lands thus granted from taxation, but said ordinance shall provide that all such lands shall be exempt from taxation by said State so long and to such extent as such act of Congress may prescribe.

"Third. That the debts and liabilities of said Territory of Arizona and of said Territory of New Mexico shall be assumed and paid by said State, and that said State shall be subrogated to all the rights of indemnity and reimbursement which either of said Territories now has.

"Fourth. That provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools, which shall be open to all the children of said State and free from sectarian control; and that said schools shall always be conducted in English: Provided, That nothing in this act shall preclude the teaching of other languages in said public schools.

"Fifth. That said State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that ability to read, write, and speak the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all State officers.

"Sixth. That the capital of said State shall temporarily be at the city of Santa Fe, in the present Territory of New Mexico, and shall not be changed therefrom previous to anno Domini nineteen hundred and fifteen, but the permanent location of said capital may, after said year, be fixed by the electors of said State, voting at an election to be provided for by the legislature.

"SEC. 26. That in case a constitution and State government shall be formed in compliance with the provisions of this act, the convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said proposed State for its ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at a time fixed in said ordinance, which shall be not less than sixty days nor more than ninety days from the adjournment of the convention, at which election the qualified voters of said proposed State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution and for or against any provisions thereof separately submitted. The returns of said election shall be made by the election officers direct to the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico at Santa Fe; who, with the governors and chief justices of said Territories, or any four of them, shall meet at said city of Santa Fe on the third Monday after said election and shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes cast on that question shall be for the constitution the said canvassing board shall certify the result to the President of the United States, together with the statement of the votes cast thereon, and upon separate articles or propositions, and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances. And if the constitution and government of said proposed State are republican in form, and if the provisions in this act have been complied with in the formation thereof, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, within twenty days from the receipt of the certificate of the result of said election and the statement of the votes cast thereon and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances from said board, to issue his proclamation announcing the result of said election, and thereupon the proposed State shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union, under and by virtue of this act, under the name of Arizona, on an equal footing with the original States, from and after the date of said proclamation.

"The original of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances, and the election returns, and a copy of the statement of the votes cast at said election shall be forwarded and turned over by the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico to the State authorities.

"SEC. 27. That until the next general census, or until otherwise provided by law, said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representatives, together with the governor and other officers provided for in said constitution, and also all other State and county officers, shall be elected on the same day of the election for the adoption of the constitution; and until said State officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution, and the State is admitted into the Union, the Territorial officers of said Territories, respectively, including delegates to Congress, shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices in said Territories until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

"SEC. 28. That upon the admission of said State into the Union there is hereby granted unto it, including the sections thereof heretofore granted, four sections of public land in each township in the proposed State for the support of free public nonsectarian common schools, to wit: Sections numbered thirteen, sixteen, thirty-three, and thirty-six, and where such sections or any parts thereof have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter section and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken; such indemnity lands to be selected within said respective portions of said State in the manner provided in this act: Provided, That the thirteenth, sixteenth, thirty-third, and thirty-sixth sections embraced in permanent reservations for national purposes shall not at any time be subjected to the grants nor to the indemnity provisions of this act, but other lands equivalent thereto may be selected for such school purposes in lieu thereof; nor shall any lands embraced in Indian, military, or other reservations of any character be subject to the grants of this act, but such reservation lands shall be subject to the indemnity provision of this act: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall repeal or affect any act of Congress relating to the Casa Grande Ruin as now defined or as may be hereafter defined or extended, or the power of the United States over it, or any other lands embraced in the State hereafter set aside by Congress as a national park, game preserve, or for the preservation of objects of archæological or ethnological interest; and nothing contained in this act shall interfere with the rights and ownership of the United States in any land hereafter set aside by Congress as national park, game preserve, or other reservation, or in the said Casa Grande Ruin as it now is or may be hereafter defined or extended by law, but exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, shall be exercised by the United States, which shall have exclusive control and jurisdiction over the same; but nothing in this proviso contained shall be construed to prevent the service within said Casa Grande Ruin, or national parks, game preserves, and other reservations hereafter established by law, of civil and criminal processes lawfully issued by the authority of said State; and said lands shall not be subject at any time to the school grants of this act that may be embraced within the metes and bounds of the national park, game preserve, and other reservation, or the said Casa Grande Ruin, as now defined or may be hereafter defined; but other lands equivalent thereto may be selected for such school purposes hereinbefore provided in lieu thereof.

"SEC. 29. That three hundred sections of the unappropriated nonmineral public lands within said State, to be selected and located in legal subdivisions, as provided in this act, are hereby granted to said State for the purpose of erecting legislative, executive, and judicial public buildings in the same, and for the payment of the bonds heretofore or hereafter issued therefor.

"SEC. 30. That the lands granted to the Territory of Arizona by the act of February eighteenth, eighteen hundred and eighty-one, entitled 'An act to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming for university purposes,' are hereby vested in the proposed State to the extent of the full quantity of seventy-five sections, and any portion of said lands that may not have been selected by said Territory of Arizona may be selected by the said State. In addition to the foregoing, and in addition to all lands heretofore granted for such purpose, there shall be, and hereby is, granted to said State, to take effect when the same is admitted to the Union, three hundred sections of land, to be selected from the public domain within said State in the same manner as provided in this act, and the proceeds of all such lands shall constitute a permanent fund, to be safely invested and held by said State, and the income thereof be used exclusively for university purposes. The schools, colleges, and universities provided for in this act shall forever remain under the exclusive control of the said State, and no part of the proceeds arising from the sale or disposal of any lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be used for the support of any sectarian or denominational school, college, or university.

"SEC. 31. That nothing in this act shall be so construed, except where the same is so specifically stated, as to repeal any grant of land heretofore made by any act of Congress to either of said Territories, but such grants are hereby ratified and confirmed in and to said State, and all of the land that may not, at the time of the admission of said State into the Union, have been selected and segregated from the public domain, may be so selected and segregated in the manner provided in this act.

"SEC. 32. That five per centum of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State to be used as a permanent fund, the interest of which only shall be expended for the support of the common schools within said State. And there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of five million dollars for the use and benefit of the common schools of said State. Said appropriation shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States at such time and to such person or persons as may be authorized by said State to receive the same under laws to be enacted by said State, and until said State shall enact such laws said appropriation shall not be paid. Said appropriation of five million dollars shall be held inviolable and invested by said State, in trust, for the use and benefit of said schools.

"SEC. 33. That all lands herein granted for educational purposes may be appraised and disposed of only at public sale, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the income from which only shall be expended in the support of said schools. But said lands may, under such regulations as the legislature shall prescribe, be leased for periods of not more than ten years, and such common school land shall not be subject to preemption, homestead entry, or any other entry under the land laws of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, but shall be reserved for school purposes only.

"SEC. 34. That in lieu of the grant of land for purposes of internal improvement made to new States by the eighth section of the act of September fourth, eighteen hundred and forty-one, which section is hereby repealed as to the proposed State, and in lieu of any claim or demand by the said State under the act of September twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and fifty, and section twenty-four hundred and seventy-nine of the Revised Statutes, making a grant of swamp and overflowed lands to certain States, which grant it is hereby declared is not extended to the said State, and in lieu of any grant of saline lands to said State, save as heretofore made, the following grants of land from public lands of the United States within said State are hereby made, to wit:

"SEC. 35. That all lands granted in quantity or as indemnity by this act shall be selected, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, from the unappropriated public lands of the United States within the limits of the said State, by a commission composed of the governor, surveyor-general, and attorney-general of said State; and no fees shall be charged for passing the title to the same or for the preliminary proceedings thereof.

"SEC. 36. That all mineral lands shall be exempted from the grants made by this act; but if any portion thereof shall be found by the Department of the Interior to be mineral lands, said State, by the commission provided for in section thirty-five hereof, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized and empowered to select, in legal subdivisions, an equal quantity of other unappropriated lands in said State in lieu thereof.

"SEC. 37. That the said State, when admitted as aforesaid, shall constitute two judicial districts, to be named, respectively, the eastern and western districts of Arizona, the boundaries of said districts to be the same as the boundaries of said Territories, respectively, and the circuit and district court of said districts shall be held, respectively, at Albuquerque and Phoenix for the time being, and the said districts shall, for judicial purposes, until otherwise provided, be attached to the ninth judicial circuit. There shall be appointed for each of said districts one district judge, one United States attorney, and one United States marshal. The judge of each of said districts shall receive a yearly salary the same as other similar judges of the United States, payable as provided for by law, and shall reside in the district to which he is appointed. There shall be appointed clerks of said courts, who shall keep their offices at said Albuquerque and Phoenix in said State. The regular terms of said courts shall be held in said districts, at the places aforesaid, on the first Monday in April and the first Monday in November of each year, and one grand jury shall be summoned in each year in each of said circuit and district courts. The circuit and district courts for said districts, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations. The marshal, district attorney, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of said district, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation now allowed by law to officers performing similar services for the United States in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, respectively.

"SEC. 38. That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of either of said Territories, or that may hereafter lawfully be prosecuted upon any record from said courts, may be heard and determined by said Supreme Court of the United States. And the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district courts, respectively, hereby established within the said State or to the supreme court of such State, as the nature of the case may require. And the circuit, district, and State courts herein named shall, respectively, be the successors of the supreme courts of the said Territories as to all such cases arising within the limits or embraced within the jurisdiction of such courts, respectively, with full power to proceed with the same and award mesne or final process therein; and that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme courts of the said Territories mentioned in this act, in any case arising within the limits of the proposed State prior to admission, the parties to such judgment shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court of the United States or to the circuit court of appeals as they shall have had by law prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

"SEC. 39. That in respect to all cases, proceedings, and matters now pending in the supreme or district courts of the said Territories at the time of the admission into the Union of the said State, and arising within the limits of such State, whereof the circuit or district courts by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States had such courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of said Territories, respectively; and in respect to all other cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the said Territories at the time of the admission of such Territories into the Union, arising within the limits of said State, the courts established by such State shall, respectively, be the successors of said supreme and district Territorial courts; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating to any such cases shall be transferred to such circuit, district, and State courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law; but no writ, action, indictment, cause, or proceeding now pending, or that prior to the admission of the State shall be pending, in any Territorial court in said Territories shall abate by the admission of such State into the Union, but the same shall be transferred and proceeded with in the proper United States circuit, district, or State court, as the case may be: Provided, however, That in all civil actions, causes, and proceedings in which the United States is not a party transfers shall not be made to the circuit and district courts of the United States except upon cause shown by written request of one of the parties to such action or proceeding filed in the proper court; and in the absence of such request such cases shall be proceeded with in the proper State courts.

"SEC. 40. That the constitutional convention shall by ordinance provide for the election of officers for a full State government, including members of the legislature and two Representatives in Congress, at the time for the election for the ratification or rejection of the constitution; one of which Representatives shall be chosen from a Congressional district comprised of the present Territory of Arizona, to be known as the First Congressional district, and the other from a Congressional district comprised of the remainder of said State, to be known as the Second Congressional district; but the said State government shall remain in abeyance until the State shall be admitted into the Union as proposed by this act. In case the constitution of said State shall be ratified by a majority of the qualified voters of said Territories voting at the election held therefor as hereinbefore provided, but not otherwise, the legislature thereof may assemble at Sante Fe, organize, and elect two Senators of the United States in the manner now prescribed by the laws of the United States; and the governor and secretary of state of the proposed State shall certify the election of the Senators and Representatives in the manner required by law, and when such State is admitted into the Union, as provided in this act, the Senators and Representatives shall be entitled to be admitted to seats in Congress and to all rights and privileges of Senators and Representatives of other States in the Congress of the United States; and the officers of the State government formed in pursuance of said constitution, as provided by the constitutional convention, shall proceed to exercise all the functions of State officers; and all laws of said Territories in force at the time of their admission into the Union shall be in force in the respective portions of said State until changed by the legislature of said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State; and the laws of the United States shall have the same force and effect within the said States as elsewhere within the United States.

"SEC. 41. That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for defraying all and every kind and character of expense incident to the elections and conventions provided for in this act; that is, the payment of the expenses of holding the election for members of the constitutional convention and the submission of the question of joint statehood and the election for the ratification of the constitution, at the same rates that are paid for similar services under the Territorial laws, respectively, and for the payment of the mileage for and salaries of members of the constitutional convention at the same rates that are paid the said Territorial legislatures under national law, and for the payment of all proper and necessary expenses, officers, clerks, and messengers thereof, and printing and other expenses incident thereto: Provided, That any expense incurred in excess of said sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be paid by said State. The said money shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be forwarded, to be locally expended in the present Territory of Arizona and in the present Territory of New Mexico, through the respective secretaries of said Territories, as may be necessary and proper, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, in order to carry out the full intent and meaning of this act."

Restore the title so as to read: "An act to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

ALASKA CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. PILES obtained the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if I can get the floor at this time, I wish to ask for the present consideration of a bill relating to Hawaii.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has been recognized.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5901) to extend the time for the completion of the Alaska Central Railway, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington what committee reported the bill.

Mr. PILES. The Committee on Territories. This has no relation to the other bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I know, but I must enter my objection, as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, to the passag of bills coming from any committee which grant public lands. Any bill granting public lands, it seems to me, should be sent to the Committee on Public Lands. That has been the uniform practice heretofore, and I do not understand why these several railroad bills, which grant public lands for right of way and other purposes, have not been sent to the Committee on Public Lands, which certainly has jurisdiction of questions of that kind.

Mr. PILES. I hope the Senator will not object to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not want to object to it. I do not want to cast any reflection on the Committee on Territories. But it comes from a committee that does not have jurisdiction of these questions, and I simply desire to enter my protest here against it, because I desire to preserve the integrity of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the Senator will not object to the consideration and passage of the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply wish to enter a protest to legislation of this kind coming from any committee other than the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I understand that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has some amendments to offer to the bill, and I have some that I desire to offer. The amendments were substantially prepared, but in the meantime the form of the bill was changed somewhat from the original.

Mr. PILES. This is a different bill, if the Senator will pardon me. This is a bill about which I spoke to the Senator a few days ago, which ex-Senator Turner requested me to get through for him.

Mr. CARTER. The Alaska railroad?

Mr. PILES. The Alaska Central Railroad.

Mr. CARTER. I have no objection to it.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope there will be no further objection to the bill.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Territories with an amendment, on page 4, line 9, after the word "company," to strike out "and its property;" in line 10, after the word "from," to strike out "taxation" and insert "license tax and tax on its railway and railway property;" so as to make the clause read:

Fifth. Said company shall be exempt from license tax and tax on its railway and railway property during the period of construction and for five years thereafter.

Mr. PETTUS. Is this bill now on its passage?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been stated.

Mr. PETTUS. Has the Senate agreed to its consideration?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood there was no objection to its consideration.

Mr. PETTUS. There are a great many important grants in it, and I should like to have them explained by the report of the committee.

Mr. PILES. The grants, if the Senator will pardon me, are not at all important, as I view it. The grant of land to this company, which has already built 46 miles of railroad and which has expended $2,500,000, is 160 acres for terminal facilities on the Tanana and Yukon rivers, and a similar grant between intermediate points approximately 100 miles apart. Then it gives a small amount, a shore line, of an acre, or thereabouts. Then it gives twenty-eight one-hundredths of an acre and the right to purchase an intervening tract of land lying between two homesteads. There is no large grant of land in this bill. It is merely a grant that is absolutely necessary to enable the company to have proper terminal facilities for the carrying on of the great enterprise, on which, as I have heretofore said, they have already spent more than $2,000,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLINTON COUNTY, IOWA.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 18330) transferring the county of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, from the northern judicial district of Iowa to the southern judicial district of Iowa.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following:

But the same shall be proceeded with and tried in the said northern district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LIEUT. JAMES M. PICKRELL, UNITED STATES NAVY, RETIRED.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1812) for the relief of Lieut. James M. Pickrell, United States Navy, retired.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Lieut. James M. Pickrell, United States Navy, retired, a lieutenant-commander on the retired list of the Navy.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. MARTIN. The amendment was incorporated by mistake. It was not ordered by the committee. It is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported an amendment, to strike out the preamble; which was agreed to.

CHILD LABOR IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17838) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On June 6 last the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole and read.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That no child under 14 years of age shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in the District of Columbia in any factory, workshop, mercantile establishment, store, business office, telegraph office, restaurant, hotel, apartment house, theater, bowling alley, or in the distribution or transmission of merchandise or messages, or selling newspapers. No such child shall be employed in any work performed for wages or other compensation, to whomsoever payable, during the hours when the public schools of the District of Columbia are in session, nor before the hour of 6 o'clock in the morning or after the hour of 7 o'clock in the evening.

SEC. 2. That no child under 16 years of age shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in the District of Columbia in any of the establishments named in section 1, unless the person or corporation employing him procures and keeps on file and accessible to the inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia an age and schooling certificate, and keeps two complete lists of all such children employed therein, one on file and one conspicuously posted near the principal entrance of the building in which such children are employed.

SEC. 3. That an age and schooling certificate shall be approved only by the superintendent of public schools, or by a person authorized by him in writing, who shall have authority to administer the oath provided for therein, but no fee shall be charged therefor.

SEC. 4. SEC. 5. That the age and schooling certificate of a child under 16 years of age shall be in the following form:

AGE AND SCHOOLING CERTIFICATE.

SEC. 6. That whoever employs a child under 16 years of age, and whoever having under his control a child under such age permits such child to be employed, in violation of sections 1, 2, 8, or 9 of this act shall, for such offense, be fined not more than $50; and whoever continues to employ any child in violation of any of said sections of this act, after being notified by an inspector, authorized by this act, or a truant officer of the District of Columbia, shall for every day thereafter that such employment continues be fined not less than $5 nor more than $20. A failure to produce to an inspector authorized by this act, or a truant officer of the District of Columbia, any age or schooling certificate or list required by this act shall be prima facie evidence of illegal employment of any person whose age and schooling certificate is not produced or whose name is not so listed. Any corporation or employer retaining any age and schooling certificate in violation of section 5 of this act shall be fined $10. Every person authorized to sign the certificate prescribed by section 5 of this act who knowingly certifies to any materially false statement therein shall be fined not more than $50.

SEC. 7. That inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia may visit the factories, workshops, and mercantile establishments in the District of Columbia and ascertain whether any minors are employed therein contrary to the provisions of this act, and they shall report any cases of such illegal employment to the superintendent of public schools and the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia. Inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia may require that the age and schooling certificates and lists provided for in this act of minors employed in such factories, workshops, or mercantile establishments shall be produced for their inspection.

SEC. 8. The printed form of such notice shall be furnished by the inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia, and the employment of any such person for a longer time in any day than that so stated shall be deemed a violation of this section.

SEC. 10. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint two inspectors to carry out the purposes of this act, at a compensation not exceeding $1,200 each per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 8, after the word "newspapers," insert the following:

Except that the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia may make regulations for the issuance of licenses to minors between the ages of 12 and 14 years to sell newspapers: Provided, That no such licenses shall be issued except on the written consent of the superintendent of the public schools, and that such license so issued shall be revoked at any time on the demand of the said superintendent of the public schools.

Mr. DUBOIS. I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I would inquire whether the bill requires boys to take out licenses before they may sell newspapers?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that, as I understand the bill, it did prohibit newsboys from selling newspapers, and the amendment I have offered allows boys of the age of 12 to 14 to sell newspapers when they have been licensed.

Mr. NELSON. I object to that provision in the bill.

Mr. CLAY. I will ask the Senator whether it is not true——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true that no boy can sell a newspaper in this city, under the bill and amendment, unless licensed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia would be the sole judges as to whether a boy may sell newspapers?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is true under the amendment, but my understanding is that a boy is absolutely prohibited from doing it under the terms of the bill, and the amendment was designed to fix it so that he might secure a license.

Mr. NELSON. Then I shall have to object to the bill. I began life in 1849 as a newsboy. I had to earn my living. I do not think it is fair that a good honest boy must go and procure a license before he can sell newspapers in the city of Washington. If that is in the bill, I am opposed to it, and object to its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the consideration of the bill. It will lie over and retain its place on the Calendar.

TIMBER ON MENOMINEE INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13372) to authorize the sale of timber on certain of the lands reserved for the use of the Menominee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit the business committee of the Menominee tribe of Indians in Wisconsin to cause to be cut into logs and hauled to suitable places for sawing and cause to be scaled, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the dead and down timber on the north one-half of township No. 29, range No. 13 east; the north half of township No. 29, range No. 14 east, and in the south half of township No. 30, range No. 13 east, on the Menominee Indian Reservation in Wisconsin, as herein provided, such cutting of timber to be in addition to the amount authorized to be cut and sold annually by the act of June 12, 1890 (26 Statutes at Large, page 146).

The Secretary of the Interior shall make contracts with a sufficient number of portable-mill owners to come upon the reservation and saw into lumber the logs so cut from such dead and down timber, the compensation for such sawing to be fixed at a certain rate per thousand feet, which amount shall not exceed the sum of $3.50 per thousand feet board measure, both hard and soft wood included. That in so far as possible the labor employed in sawing said timber into lumber shall be secured from among the members of said tribe.

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay out of the funds of said Menominee tribe of Indians now on deposit in the United States Treasury all necessary expenses incurred in the cutting and sawing of the timber, as provided herein, which amount of money shall be reimbursed from the sale of the lumber as herein provided.

That said lumber shall be sold in such quantities as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to the highest and best bidder for cash after due advertisement inviting proposals and in such manner and at such time and place as the Secretary may direct, and from the proceeds of the sales of such lumber there shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the said Menominee tribe of Indians the amount of money paid out of said fund as the expense of cutting, sawing, piling, and grading said lumber; and there shall also be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Indians the one-fifth part of the net proceeds of the sales of said lumber, to be used under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of said Indians, and the residue of said proceeds shall be deposited in the United States Treasury to the credit of said tribe and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, to be paid to the said tribe per capita in semiannual cash payments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the cutting, sawing into lumber, and sale of timber on certain lands reserved for the use of the Menominee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin."

PENSIONS TO SURVIVORS OF INDIAN WARS IN UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 3469) to extend the provisions of the act of June 27, 1902, entitled "An act to extend the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled 'An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war,' approved July 27, 1892."

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to extend the provisions of the act of July 27, 1892, as amended by the act of June 27, 1902, to include the Indian wars which occurred in the Territory of Utah down to and including those which took place in the year 1867. But before the name of any person shall be placed on the pension roll under this act proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, that the applicant is entitled to a pension under this act. The loss or lack of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive the applicant of the benefit of this act, but other proof of service performed and an honorable discharge, if satisfactory, shall be deemed sufficient; and when there is no record evidence of such service and such discharge, the applicant may establish the same by other satisfactory testimony.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN PENSACOLA, FLA.

Mr. MALLORY obtained the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. MALLORY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When I offered the amendment as to boys selling newspapers to the bill regulating the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia, I did not anticipate that the Senator from Minnesota would object to the whole bill. I am perfectly willing to withdraw that amendment, if there will be no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. If I understand that the bill itself does not require newsboys to take out licenses and that that amendment is not to be offered, I will make no objection.

Mr. DUBOIS. The bill does not require newsboys to take out licenses.

Mr. NELSON. If that amendment will not be offered, then I withdraw my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield for that purpose?

Mr. MALLORY. I prefer to have the bill considered that I rose to call up. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5418) relinquishing the title of the United States to certain land in the city of Pensacola, Fla., to James Wilkins.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAKE SCHUTTE CEMETERY CORPORATION.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6256) to authorize the Lake Schutte Cemetery Corporation to convey lands heretofore granted to it.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PETTUS. That seems to be an act diverting land from the use for which it was granted. I should like to hear the report of the committee read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. HANSBROUGH May 31, 1906, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6256) to authorize the Lake Schutte Cemetery Corporation to convey lands heretofore granted to it, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The facts leading up to this legislation are as follows:

By section 5 of the act of February 28, 1899 (30 Stat. L., 916), the S. ½ of the NW. ¼ of sec. 30, T. 162 N., R. 72 W., was granted to the Lake Schutte Cemetery Corporation, of Dunseith, N. Dak., "to have and to hold said lands to its use and behoof forever for cemetery purposes."

On May 5, 1905, lots 3 and 4 (N. ½) of the SW. ¼ of this section were patented to Robert C. Wynn.

It transpired subsequent to the passage of the act of February 28, 1899, that the cemetery is located, wholly or in part, on lot 3, or the NW. ¼ of the SW. ¼ of sec. 30, instead of on the lands granted, and it is now desired that the cemetery company be empowered to make a transfer in order to rectify this mistake.

The following letter from Dr. C. M. Wagner, of Dunseith, N. Dak., to Senator HANSBROUGH, serves further to explain the situation:

DUNSEITH, N. DAK., May 10, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We are in a plight about our cemetery being on the wrong land. The land deeded to the Lake Schutte Cemetery through your kindness several years ago is the wrong eighty. The cemetery now is on land owned by one Robert Wynn, while the land deeded to us is an eighty north. Now, Mr. Wynn will transfer the land where the burial ground is now for the land we were given for the cemetery, providing we are given power from Congress to make the transfer. The land given us is the SW. ¼ of the NW. ¼, sec. 30, T. 162 N., R. 72 W., while the burial ground is on the NW. ¼ of the SW. ¼. Can't you have this tangle straightened out for us and greatly oblige the community here?

I am, yours, most truly, C. M. WAGNER.

Hon. H. C. HANSBROUGH, Washington, D. C.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISHERIES OF ALASKA.

Mr. FULTON. I ask for the consideration of bill (H. R. 13543) for the protection and regulation of the fisheries of Alaska.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Fisheries with an amendment, on page 4, to strike out section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That the money derived from the license taxes, as provided for in section 1 of this act, shall be paid into the United States Treasury and shall constitute a permanent appropriation, to be known as the "Alaskan fisheries fund," to be used under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor for the purpose of propagation and fish culture and the construction and maintenance of fish hatcheries in the waters of Alaska, for the protection, regulation, investigation, and inspection of the Alaskan fisheries and hatcheries, for the collection and compilation of statistics and information pertaining thereto, and for the enforcement of the law and the regulations made thereunder with reference to the subject of fisheries in the waters of Alaska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN COMANCHE COUNTY, OKLA.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16785) giving preference right to actual settlers on pasture reserve No. 3 to purchase land leased to them for agricultural purposes in Comanche County, Okla.

Mr. BLACKBURN. After the consideration of that bill I shall move to adjourn.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I suggest that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 13, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 12, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct the Journal. As I understood, the Clerk announced that Mr. LAMAR was appointed as one of the conferees on the bill H. R. 19681. It was Mr. ZENOR who was the minority conferee.

The SPEAKER. The Journal is correct.

RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House, No. 571, have had the same under consideration, and in lieu thereof report the following:

"Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the Senate amendments thereto, be, and hereby is, taken from the Speaker's table; that the House further insists on its disagreement to the Senate amendments thereto in gross, and that the conference asked by the Senate is hereby agreed to; whereupon immediately, without intervening motion, the managers of the conference shall be appointed."

Mr. DALZELL. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he would yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment before he calls for the previous question?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 150, noes 81.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 186, nays 92, answered "present" 8, not voting 94, as follows:

For the vote:

Mr. RHODES with Mr. WOOD of Missouri.

Mr. BENNETT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, at the time my name was called I voted "aye," but I find that I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. HUFF. I wish to change my vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BENNETT of Kentucky; and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary that I should take up any time substantially in explaining the situation. The bill referred to in the resolution which is pending is the rate bill, a bill passed by the House and sent to the Senate, from which it came back to the House with fifty amendments. The House disagreed to those amendments and asked for a conference. The Senate agreed to the conference. The Senate has disagreed to a report made to the Senate by the conference committee, and asked for a further conference on the part of the House. The question presented to the House now arises from the fact that the bill with the Senate amendments and the notice of the Senate disagreement and of its request is on the Speaker's table. The proposition is to take the papers from the Speaker's table, to further insist upon the House disagreement to the Senate amendment, and to agree to the conference.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the Speaker at the expiration of three minutes to inform me of that fact. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is right, I think, in saying it is not worth while talking very much about this matter. The House has grown accustomed to this sort of performance by now, or, if not, it is hard for it to get used to anything. The last time this matter was up and sent to conference the promise was held out, to our ears, at least, that when it came back to the House the House should have an opportunity to express itself upon the several questions involved. Now, a rule, substantially like the other rule, is being urged, and I have no doubt that the same promise that was held out before will be held out again.

I take it that the Members of the House know what they are doing. They know that if they vote "aye" when the roll call comes they shut off all opportunity to amend this rule, shut off all opportunity of the House to be heard upon any one of the particular matters involved, and if they vote "no" and vote the rule down they will get an opportunity to amend in accordance with the views of a majority of the Members, and if they should get an opportunity we would like upon this side to offer an amendment which was offered in the committee and voted down.

A MEMBER. What is it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In my time I shall read it. It is the amendment which I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to allow me to offer. It is this——

Mr. DALZELL. If the gentleman from Mississippi will allow me, the gentleman has made reference to what was done in committee. Now, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Did I not say to the gentleman in committee I was as strongly in favor of this amendment as the gentleman was?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; the gentleman did, and the gentleman indicated in a minute afterwards that he was in favor of it by voting against it, and he indicated it a moment ago by not yielding even to offer the amendment. The amendment we want to offer reads as follows:

Provided, however, That the House conferees are instructed to concur in the Senate amendment declaring sleeping-car companies to be common carriers, and are further instructed to insist upon exempting from the provision forbidding free passes officials and employees of the railroads and their immediate families.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, further comment is unnecessary, and I shall now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, this is an effort to again prevent the House from doing that which, under the rules of the House governing conference reports, it has the right to do. In order to avoid that, this resolution proposes to enact this special rule, in order to prevent the House from passing upon these Senate amendments and agreeing to some and amending others, which it would do if it had the opportunity. The Senate conferees and the House conferees have made a report, agreeing on a number of important amendments that the Senate made, which made the bill a better bill than when it went from the House, and making changes in others. I have not the time to call the attention of the House to all of them, but I will call the attention of the House to two. One is that amendment which strikes from the House bill the words "fairly remunerative," which words ought never to have been written in the bill in the House or elsewhere. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Another amendment to this report, which I favor and which this House will make, is one which will permit railroads to grant free transportation to its employees and their families. Now, when this matter of sending the bill to conference was up for the first time, on the 25th day of May last, that side was told by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that they ought to vote for the rule, which was then proposed, to send this bill to conference in order to prevent the gentleman from Mississippi and his associates on this side from being "placed in the saddle" and taking control of this legislation, and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who was a member of the Committee on Rules then, and is now, and who joins in this report from the Rules Committee, made the statement upon this floor as to what would happen when this conference report should come back; and I desire to call to the attention of the House what the gentleman then said. The gentleman from Ohio, I suppose in order to allay the demand from his own side for an opportunity to vote on the Senate amendments, made this statement:

> We are not in the hands either of the Democratic minority or in the hands of a conference committee. Is there a man here who by his vote will doubt that that conference committee will at a very early date report this important bill back? And let me make a statement, Mr. Speaker, and I ask the House to hear what I say and measure my language—when that conference report comes back there will be a chance to vote on every amendment the House desires to vote upon, and there will be debate, and for once in my life I think I occupy a position where I can enforce the suggestion which I have made.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman occupies to-day the same position he did then; he is still a member of the Committee on Rules, and he can enforce the suggestion that he then made.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have but three minutes—yes; I will.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman does not mean to insinuate there is any conference report before this House now?

Mr. BARTLETT. I mean to say I hold in my hand a conference report made by the conferees both to the Senate and the House. Here it is, made to this House on Saturday, June 2, and it was printed in the RECORD of that day in compliance with the rules of the House on that subject.

Mr. DALZELL. Why, the gentleman is sufficiently informed in parliamentary law to know that is no report, but is a disagreement on the part of the Senate when the House has acted on it first. There is no conference report before this House.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is a conference report before this House, made as conference reports are usually made; and does not this rule declare that we take from the Speaker's table the conference report, disagree to the report and to the amendments "en bloc," and send it back to conference? The very report that you make from your committee, the very resolution that you report for our consideration calls it a conference report. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to live up to the promise he made to the House on the 25th day of May. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker and fellow-Members of the House, the position of this House can not better be stated than by paraphrasing what was stated long ago by Joshua, "Choose you this day whom you will serve"—the sleeping-car companies or the people. As for me and my household, we will serve the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is not fair to this body nor to the other coordinate body to say that this is a political measure. On February 8, 1906, this measure passed this House with an affirmative vote of 346 and a negative vote of 7, all of whom belonged to the same political party of which I am a member—the Republican party. This measure went to another body, and on May 18, 1906, seventy-one Senators voted for this rate bill and three Senators voted against it, one of whom was a Republican and two of whom were Democrats.

My fellow-Members, do not try to dodge behind the fact that it is a party measure. The people know better. Choose you to-day which you will serve. Come out into the open; stand as men and acquit yourselves as men. Do not stand behind the flimsy excuse that you want a full, fair conference and untrammeled by instructions. On last Saturday there came into this House a conference report, and the conferees rejected the sleeping-car companies' amendment and refused to include them under the law. The House conferees insisted that railway officials and their workmen and the members of their immediate families should not have transportation. The House conferees insisted that stockmen in charge of stock should not have free transportation. You can not disguise it. It stands here in the RECORD. It is true, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] says, it is not now a conference report, because another body heard from the people, another body found that the people were aroused and outraged at this conference, and they forced that back again to conference; and that is why technically this is not a conference report. But every man in this House knows that if these conferees are appointed again and no instruction is had they will go out and do exactly what they have done in this case, and no one of them dares to stand up on the floor of this House and say that they will include sleeping-car companies and give to these railroad officials and to employees and the members of their immediate families transportation, and give to stockmen free transportation. If the conferees will say so, I will vote for the rule; if they do not say so, I will vote against the rule; and the country will expect every man to do his duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] From the temper of this House now, I think the conferees will be able to sit up and take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LILLEY].

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad, indeed, if this House to-day and in this hour could put the seal of its disapproval on that clause in this bill which says that railroad employees and their families can not be furnished free transportation by their employer. How it came in the bill I do not know; but this I do know, that if it was put in in good faith the man who placed it there forgot the engineer leaning far out of the cab, with his eye on the rail all night, and the passenger asleep, and sleeping because he knew the man was there. He forgot the rear brakeman, who often stands out in the storm, with the thermometer below zero, guarding the rear of the train, while he sleeps because he knows the man is there. I would be glad if we could put the seal of our disapproval upon that clause now. I find no fault with the leadership which says that this is not the proper time, but I shall find fault, and I shall not vote for the bill if that clause is not eliminated. Fully one-fourth of the residents of my district are directly affected by this bill. And I ask you now; I ask my friends upon my side of the House, while I am here on the Cherokee Strip, upon the other side—I ask you not to place us in the position of going home to our constituents with having even to vote upon such a proposition, and I ask the conferees when it gets back to them to see to it that it is taken out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me if ever there was any occasion where the rigid rule enforced in the House should be relaxed, it ought to be on this occasion, when a matter of such vast importance is being considered, and an opportunity should be afforded to every gentleman who desires to express his opinion upon these important amendments. This is practically the only way in which the conferees can be informed as to the views of the House.

It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that since the declaration made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], giving us assurances as to an opportunity that each Member of the House would have to express on the floor of the House his opinion as to certain important amendments made by the Senate to the House bill, a very important feature—one which has attracted much attention in this House and throughout the country—has been brought in as added by the report of the conferees. That is the antipass provision that was substituted for the antipass amendment made by the Senate. It relates to the prohibition of free transportation to employees of railroads and their families over the lines on which they are employed. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I violate any obligation placed upon me as a conferee when I say that when this matter was brought up in the conference, believing that I represented fairly the Democratic sentiment, that I protested earnestly against the exclusion of employees and their families from free transportation, and reserved the right, Mr. Speaker, to protest against it on the floor of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to use some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the rule. I think I understand that this is an ordinary procedure to determine eventually what this House wishes. If I thought otherwise, I should certainly oppose the rule at this time. It seems to me that a Member of Congress would be exceedingly dull who did not understand the sentiment of the House in regard to certain provisions in this bill, certain amendments pertaining to it. I have been well pleased with the bill up to date. In fact, I think it is a much better bill than the most ardent friends of the legislation thought possible when his Congress began. I am satisfied with the action of the conferees on most of the amendments. I do believe that the two amendments to which reference has been made—namely, in reference to sleeping cars and passes for employees of railroads and their families—should be adopted. I stood on this floor and defended the proposition originally that the House bill included sleeping cars. I believed it then. I am not certain it is not true now. But when I heard gentlemen, some of them now conferees on this bill, declare on the floor of this House that sleeping-car companies were not contained therein; when I recall that the bill went over to the Senate and that that body believed that these companies were not included and adopted an amendment to include them; when I understand, again, that the amendment went out in conference, I am convinced that undoubtedly I was mistaken when I said they were included in the House bill. I realize that the courts in construing a law do not rely upon what Members of Congress say; but the court would be dull indeed which did not take notice of things which have transpired with reference to this amendment. It is true that during all these hearings on this question no witness ever appeared to make complaint against a sleeping-car company, and I have no recollection that a word was ever mentioned in our committee on this subject; but we have reached that point now when it seems to me it would be an invidious distinction which this Congress could not afford to make if it did not in express language include sleeping-car companies. [General applause.] I am not clear that they ought to go in as common carriers. I have thought that they, together with the private cars used for refrigerating purposes, were a means of transportation which could be embraced within the control of the railroad itself, and, if such, would be subject to the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to fixing the rate, and it seems to me that they should be included.

These were not specified when the other cars were mentioned; and inasmuch as we adopted the dangerous doctrine of specification, thereby including the other doctrine, elimination, it seems that they possibly—probably, I may say—remain out from the provisions of the bill.

In reference to passes to laboring men and their families, it is a fact that there has been no demand in this country that the railroads should refuse to treat their employees as they have in the past. There is no demand from the people that carriers shall not grant free transportation to their employees and their families, and this favor extended by the railroads to their employees will not furnish a cheaper rate of transportation to the people. Railroad employees are a part of the railroad. Their very business demands that they travel over the road, and their families should not be denied the privilege of traveling with their husbands and fathers if the carriers see fit to extend the favor to them. No harm can come to the people through this amendment, and a great benefit may be extended to one of the most heroic, industrious, and worthy classes of our citizens.

I am in favor of incorporating in the rate bill the amendments as to sleeping-car companies and the one allowing carriers to give free transportation to its employees and their families, and I shall feel it my duty to oppose any conference report which does not include them. I am satisfied that this disposition of mine is the same as that of a majority of the House. I trust that the House conferees will take due notice and govern themselves accordingly. We have done a good work; let it not be spoiled or marred by any act showing either favoritism or disregard of the privileges of men who by accepting them do no harm to others. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. How is the time, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has seven minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has fourteen minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield so much time as he may want to my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I should like to have about two minutes myself. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I shall not need that time.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] misapprehends the entire parliamentary situation, and aims a shot at me which can only rebound without injury to me.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I guess I had better not yield. I did not interrupt you, and I am not going to say any more about you. [Laughter.]

If the House will only consider that we are now standing in exactly the same condition in all respects that we were when I made the statement I made before, they will understand that the criticism is not justified. We are in exactly the same condition, and every argument made in favor of the action that we took before applies with equal force to the action sought to be taken now.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; if it is not too long.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to ask the gentleman if I did him any injustice in reading from the RECORD of the 25th of May what he said when this matter was up before?

Mr. GROSVENOR. You have got the point now, and you need not spend any more time on it. Either you intended to place me in a position of self-stultification, or else what you did did not have any force in it, and ought not to have been introduced at all—one or the other.

Mr. BARTLETT. I simply undertook to put the gentleman in the position that his own language placed him in, that is all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But what force has that language when we find ourselves exactly where we have been before? Will the gentleman from Georgia say now frankly to the House that he did not intend thereby, in what he did, to suggest that I had changed my position?

Mr. BARTLETT. I intended to suggest to the House the promise you had made, and expressed the hope that the gentleman would keep it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, well, then, we are all together and I will keep it; and I reiterate every word of it and stand where I stood before. And if this bill goes back to a conference that we ourselves have already agreed to, and from which we will not now, I think, turn and run, and the conferees come back here, if they are not instructed by the manifest voice of this House, we will find a way to instruct them by a most peremptory process. Now, that is all there is to this.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know this: If the House now sends this report back to the conferees and the report is not satisfactory to the House in any particular one of these amendments, can the House have a chance to vote on that particular amendment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. They can do it, and do it very easily, and do it without any difficulty, simply by voting down the conference report and send back the bill to the conference with any one or any dozen amendments that we want to have put in the bill. It is the simplest process in the world. Anybody can understand it, and I do not believe now——

Mr. DRISCOLL. Why not do that now?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Simply because it would be treating the conference unfairly.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I have great confidence in the House conferees; they did well the last time, and I hope they will do as well again.

However, many Members of the House, of which I am one, are in favor of a strong antipass provision in this law with an exception in favor of railway employees and their families. The exception should not extend much, if any, beyond this class. Now, if the antipass provision or amendment be stricken from the bill, or be encumbered with so many exceptions as to make it ridiculous and practically useless, we will want an opportunity for a vote on that question. I deem this part of the law very important, for if the companies be permitted to discriminate in the future as they have in the past in the granting of free transportations, my judgment is that the other part of the law against freight discriminations will not, and can not, be rigidly enforced. Both parts must stand or fall together.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The conferees on the part of the House have brought in here a conference report to which they had agreed. The Senate has backed out of that. I do not speak disrespectfully, but they have withdrawn their approval. Now, if we are going to have a full and free conference, we want to send them back in exactly the same position they occupied when they went to the conference before, and there are not on the floor of this House fifty votes, in my judgment, that would ratify the report now pending before the House; so there need be no fears upon that subject. I quite agree with what the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has said, that there ought to be a clear enunciation upon these two important questions, and there are some more that I differ with, but not quite so radically as I do upon those two questions.

Now, I think in fairness to the conferees, in fairness to the Senate, and in the disposal of this matter in an orderly, straightforward, businesslike way let us agree to this rule and send the bill back to the conferees, and when it comes back here if your conferees are not now instructed we will find a way to instruct them promptly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Are the Senate conferees under instructions of any kind?

Mr. GROSVENOR. None whatever, except so far as the possible sending of the bill back to them might operate as a repudiation of their action, and we are doing exactly the same thing.

Mr. MURDOCK. The debate in the Senate is in no sense an instruction?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not to me, and certainly not to the conferees. The vote of the Senate is the only instruction.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman from Mississippi now use some of his time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania intend to conclude in one speech?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the condition with reference to this matter now is precisely what it was when the matter was before the House on a former occasion. Since then the conferees have been at work, and the House and Senate and the country have been favored with their conclusions in the form of a report. It is fair to presume, I think, if anything may be presumed with reference to this matter, that the conferees of the House will again favor in conference those matters which before they favored in conference. As to a large portion of the amendments, the conference report, I think, is satisfactory. As to these amendments, it would seem that they would again agree to them, without direction or instruction of this House. As to several of the amendments, however, it is very evident that the Senate and the House and the country by no means agree with the conclusions of the conferees, but absolutely and unqualifiedly repudiate them. Two of those are covered by the amendment offered by my colleague from Mississippi, or the amendment which he would offer if a Member of this House, entitled to all the rights and powers and privileges under the Constitution of each Member, could have an opportunity in this House in the discharge of his representative duties to offer an amendment. That would instruct the conferees as to two of the amendments with which they dealt, and dealt to the great dissatisfaction of the Senate, the House, and the country.

One of these amendments is that concerning sleeping-car companies. I happened to be over in the Senate the other day when this conference report was under discussion. It was there asserted over and over and over again that the change in this particular amendment, including express companies and sleeping-car companies in the provision with reference to common carriers, by exempting sleeping-car companies, was made in response to the insistence of the House members; that the House members constrained the Senate members to depart from that portion of their amendment which embraces sleeping-car companies. So we are to have here the spectacle of this House refusing to instruct its own conferees with reference to that and committing it to these dear gentlemen again untrammeled and undirected. It is true we have again the assurance of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that by and by, in some form, at some time, in some way this House may be unshackled and individual Members and the membership collectively may be permitted to say something or do something about it. We would have the law extended to sleeping-car companies.

Take the amendment with reference to passes. I do not know what the purpose of this language reported, I do not care what the purpose of the conferees was——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Gentlemen wishing to converse will retire to the cloakroom.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I am not in the slightest degree disturbed. Those who have a desire to hear will do so, and those who do not wish to hear will not confer any favor upon me by turning aside from important business. Those who have prejudged this matter, who have closed their minds, who hold out their hands for the shackles, who have abdicated the high rights of the American Representative in an American Congress care not to hear, and I care not to speak to them.

Now, as to the pass amendment, I do not know what was the purpose of framing it in the way it appears in the conference report, but I know, and any man of common intelligence must know, that if that purpose had been to absolutely kill and destroy the antipass Senate amendment ingenuity might have furnished something better in seeming, but ingenuity could not supply anything more effective for the purpose. [Applause.] Nobody is in favor of it except those who do not mean to do anything, who wish to make a pretense and a sham out of this part of the legislation; who, assuming that the number of fools is very much greater than it is, wish to make others believe that there is a real, sober, serious, statesmanlike, honest attempt to do something on the subject, while it is very evident, whatever the purpose or intent, that the effect is to do nothing. Yet the House can not say anything upon it. I do not believe that there is a man upon this floor who dares vote against the proposition to permit passes to be issued to railroad employees and their families. Yet when you vote for this rule, when you adopt this miserable gag rule—and I am not using these terms merely for the purpose of expressing myself in strong language, but because no weak terms will describe this outrage—when you vote for this rule, you vote against permitting the issue of passes to these railroad people, and you trust to the conferees for deliverance. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that any difference of opinion which exists in this House to-day with respect to this rule grows out of a misconception of the situation. In the first place, there is no conference report before this House either to be agreed to or disagreed to. The House disagreed to the Senate amendments and asked for a conference. The Senate agreed to the conference, and until the Senate passed on that conference report there was nothing for this House to pass upon. It is true that the conferees came in here with a copy of the report agreed upon and filed with the Senate, and it went into the RECORD for information, but it is not before the House. That report is of no consequence at all until action has first been had by the Senate, so that we are back here to-day in exactly the same situation that we were when we disagreed to the Senate amendments and asked for a conference. That is my first proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before the conferees were appointed the first time we did not know their opinions on these matters. They have now filed a report that, at least, expresses their opinion.

Mr. DALZELL. We know nothing officially now about their opinion, but if we know anything about their opinion, they also know something about our opinion. [Applause.] I think we can safely trust them to carry out our opinions. In the first place, I say that there is no conference report before the House. In the second place, I say that there is nothing unusual about this proceeding. If this were not a bill that attracted great public attention and turned the eyes of the country upon the House, there would be no objection made to a request for unanimous consent to take the papers from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and send the bill to conference. In the third place, no man is bound here to-day by his vote with respect to any particular amendment. There is no question as to the merits of any amendment before the House here to-day. So far as the question of purpose is concerned, I want to say, speaking for myself, that if any conference report comes into this House excluding railroad employees and their families from free transportation I will join with every other Member of the House that I can find to join with me in voting down that report. [Applause.] Now, what is the use of talking about being gagged?

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman make the same statement with reference to voting down the report providing the report does not include sleeping-car companies?

Mr. DALZELL. Personally, yes; I am in favor of both those propositions. [Applause.] What is the use of talking about being gagged, and what is the use of talking about the House being prevented from expressing its will on this subject? There is nothing in the way of legislation that is not absolutely within the control of the majority of this House at any time, and I want to say, expressing my own opinion, that I believe that a report of the conferees failing to embody the will of the House as it has been expressed here to-day upon those two propositions would not last ten minutes in this House. It would be voted down, and then the whole fifty amendments would be open to be passed upon by the Members. This rule is, in my judgment, in the interest of expedition. It is in the interest of a fair consideration of all the questions involved in this rate bill. It is in the interest of carrying out the will of the majority of the House, and as I said, particularly is it in the interest of expedition. It is a mere question of methods, not a question of merits. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 181, noes 90.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 184, nays 100, answered "present" 7, not voting 89, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. ADAMS with Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana.

For the balance of this day:

Mr. KNAPP with Mr. HUNT.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. BURGESS.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania). If there be no objection, the Chair will announce the same conferees. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes. Now, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the conferees may be read in lieu of the reading of the report, which has been printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York calls up the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, and requests that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this a unanimous report of the conferees?

Mr. SHERMAN. A unanimous report and a complete agreement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and seven, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 27, 30, 32, 37, 41, 48, 51, 58, 62, 64, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 91, 93, 109, 113, 115, 117, 137, 138, 140, 141, 142, 146, 154, 178, 179, 180, 181, 195, 197, 203, and 204;

I ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments to the District of Columbia appropriation bill and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts as to whether there is any new legislation put in this bill by the Senate amendments, and if so, to specify what it is.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CHANEY, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the conference reports were agreed to was laid on the table.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill—with Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, before commencing the reading of this I will say that I asked unanimous consent yesterday to pass over the item in respect to the payment of salaries of registrars and receivers of the Land Office, and also the items for the Geological Survey. I give notice now that I will return to those items as soon as we complete reading that part of the bill immediately preceding the Department of Justice. The gentleman from Alabama, with whom I spoke about this before, agrees to that. We will continue until we get to the Department of Justice, and then return to the items referred to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unanimous consent was asked to return to these matters, and I do not know whether we can pass them now or not.

Mr. TAWNEY. The unanimous consent on yesterday did not state what time we would take them up. I would like to finish the reading of these few paragraphs before going back. That will bring us to the Department of Justice, and then we will take them up in the regular order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then it is understood that we will take them up just as soon as we reach the Soldiers' Home, which just precedes the Department of Justice.

The Clerk read as follows:

Vicksburg National Military Park: For continuing the work of establishing the Vicksburg National Military Park; for the compensation of three civilian commissioners and the secretary and historian; for clerical and other services, labor, iron gun carriages, the mounting of siege guns, monuments, markers, and historical tablets giving historical facts, compiled without praise and without censure; maps and surveys; roads, bridges, restoration of earthworks, purchase of land, purchase and transportation of supplies and materials, and other necessary expenses, $70,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "seventy," on page 120, in line 14, and insert "one hundred;" and, in explanation of that motion, I desire to read the following letter from the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 120, line 14, strike out "seventy" and insert "one hundred;" so as to read "one hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee, and I think the amendment will be adopted. The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 4, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. WILLIAMS: The estimate of the amount of appropriation needed for the next fiscal year as originally submitted by the Vicksburg National Military Park Commission was for $100,000. This was reduced by the Assistant Secretary of War to $70,000, which is $5,000 less than the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year.

The Park Commission have made several very earnest requests that the appropriation be made $100,000, instead of $70,000. The extra $30,000 they want for metaling the park roadways. It has been necessary in the establishment of the field to open up and grade practically all of the 26 miles of roadway in the park, so that positions could be determined and defined, and monuments, memorials, tablets, and markers erected. Owing to the peculiar character of the soil on that field, as you know, great damage is done by the heavy rains to the roads in the preliminary stages of their constructions—that is, after they are graded and before they are metaled.

Mr. Chairman, in this connection I want to say there is a peculiar conformation, running down to the river at Vicksburg, of little mountains, you might call them, without any rock. It is a bluff formation. Down about Vicksburg it is called "Walnut Ridge." It is the formation that runs into the Mississippi River at Memphis, where it is called "The Bluffs;" and farther down, at Vicksburg, and farther still, at Natchez, and then down to Baton Rouge, La., the river Mississippi jutting in and trying to break through at each place. It is almost unlike anything in this country, and a geologist once told me that the only formation like it that he knew is in China. It is a yellow loam, underlaid by gravel and orange sand. And if it is used to make a roadway, and is not metaled, so that the water percolates through the loam, the sand washes out, and the whole thing caves and sloughs. That is what the Secretary is referring to. He says further:

It is therefore of the first importance to have as much metaling done each year as possible. Before the metaling is done the cost of maintenance is very large; after the metaling it is insignificant. At the rate at which we are proceeding now with the limited appropriations it is estimated it will take five or six years to complete this road work.

It will undoubtedly be economical in the end to the Government to appropriate $100,000 instead of $70,000. These facts were presented to the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee on the sundry civil bill by Mr. Scofield, chief clerk of the War Department, but inasmuch as the estimate submitted by the Department was for $70,000, they have not seen fit to make the increase requested, and the bill as reported carries the appropriation of $70,000.

As the park is in your district, I lay these facts before you for such action as you may see fit to take.

Very truly, yours,
WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

HON. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
House of Representatives.

The Assistant Secretary who reduced the estimate did not understand the geological conformation. I express the hope, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Minnesota will accept the amendment I offer.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment. I want to say, though, that the Department, in submitting their estimate for this work, submitted an estimate for only $70,000. If the Department had submitted an estimate for $100,000 for the purpose of completing this work, or in connection with the work, the committee undoubtedly would have followed the judgment of the Department; but the Department having estimated for only $70,000, the committee did not feel justified in allowing more. It is true Mr. Schofield did suggest, when before the committee, that more money could be expended, but there was no direct recommendation in respect to it. I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Publication of records of the Philippine insurrection: To enable the Secretary of War to print the records of the Philippine insurrection, $15,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order on the provision just read—that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order on page 121, to lines 22 to 25.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say, in explanation of the item, that this is merely for the publication of records which the Government now has, and under previous authority has collected and arranged for the purpose of publication. It is merely a continuation of this work, in order to make the information available and more generally useful, so that people may have the benefit of knowing what the records contain. This does not involve the work of gathering any information or records. It merely provides for the publication of that which has been collected, arranged, and compiled under previous authority, and is a continuation of that work to completion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman for the authorization for the collection of this record, to see whether or not it is a continuation.

Mr. TAWNEY. The only authorization, Mr. Chairman, is the general authority which the War Department has in respect to matters pertaining to the Philippine Islands. One of the duties of the Insular Division of the War Department is collecting, compiling, and arranging the records of the Philippine insurrection. As one of my colleagues on the committee says, the authorization is the same as that which authorized the capture of Aguinaldo. Many of these papers were captured at the same time that Aguinaldo was captured. The records are in the Department by authority of law, and have been classified and prepared for publication.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the gentleman if these records are to be published in English or in Spanish?

Mr. TAWNEY. The publication will be in English.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Chair desire to hear from the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. Not on the point of order, unless the gentleman desires to be heard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not desire to be heard perfunctorily. Does the Chair have the slightest doubt that the point of order is well taken?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order is well taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I thought.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch, $36,000.
For repair shop, $3,500.

Mr. OTJEN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 126, after line 3, insert:
"For officers' quarters, $7,500."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. On the ground that it is not authorized by law and is new legislation.

Mr. OTJEN. I desire to make a short statement.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will reserve the point of order, so that the gentleman may make a statement.

Mr. OTJEN. The Board of Managers of the National Homes have recommended this sum be appropriated for the erection of a dwelling for one of the officers of the Home, one who is now compelled to reside outside of the grounds. The manager of the Home writes me that this item is very necessary, and it ought to be granted. I was in hopes that the chairman having this bill in charge would not make a point of order against this amendment and would be willing to consent that it go in the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the estimate submitted for this was $7,500. It was not accompanied by any detailed statement from which the committee could form an intelligent judgment as to the reasonableness of the estimate or whether or not the amount was necessary for the construction of a house such as is contemplated. I will say further, one of the facts that influenced the committee in rejecting this estimate was that it was for quarters for the commissary of subsistence, a man receiving only $1,600 a year. It is proposed to build a house costing $7,500 for a $1,600 man. There are only a very few Members of Congress who can afford a luxury of that kind. The committee thought it altogether out of proportion to the man's position, and for that reason thought the matter should go over until the Board could furnish the committee detailed information regarding the cost of the building. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $4,202,944.

Mr. BOWERSOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 134, in line 15, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "Provided, That this appropriation shall be available only under the condition that no bar or canteen shall be maintained at said Homes for the sale of beer, wine, or other intoxicating liquors."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order for the reason that it is not only new legislation, but that it is not germane, and that it comes too late to be extended to the prior provisions that have been passed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, upon the question as to whether the amendment changes existing law I desire to submit a few authorities. I have not read the amendment. I only know what it contains by having heard it read by the Clerk. I understand it to provide that no part of the appropriation for the support of National Soldiers' Homes shall be paid to any branch institution in which a bar is maintained for the sale of intoxicating liquors. I understand that to be the substance of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will read the amendment again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the amendment would perhaps better meet the point of order if the form were changed, but it is in substance a limitation.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations has a right, under the rules of the House, to provide that no part of an appropriation shall be available, or shall be paid in support of certain institutions that it would have the right to appropriate for. It is a well-understood principle that appropriation bills may carry appropriations for things authorized by law, and appropriation bills may withhold altogether appropriations for things authorized by law. The rules of the House authorize an appropriation bill to provide that a certain class of objects that it would be legitimate to appropriate for shall not be the beneficiary of any part of the appropriation made, and it would be a proper limitation upon the appropriation.

In the Fifty-eighth Congress a question very much like this arose. An amendment was proposed to the provision in the sundry civil appropriation bill carrying the fund for the assistance of State Soldiers' Homes, to the effect that no part of the appropriation should be paid to any State Soldiers' Home until its rules and regulations with respect to the question of pensions should be made to conform to the rules and regulations prescribed in a certain Federal statute; also that no part of the appropriation should be available or paid to any State Soldiers' Home that permitted a bar or canteen where intoxicating liquors were sold.

A point of order was made against the amendment, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], being in the chair, held the amendment to be a limitation. He said the question was rather a close one in relation to the rules and regulations, but he held that the principle was well settled in the House that appropriation bills could, by limitation, provide that no part of the appropriation should go to a certain class of objects that it would be legitimate to appropriate for. The practice was so well settled that he reached the conclusion that the amendment was in order without any hesitancy. He rendered a decision of some length. In the discussion of the question he referred to a decision made by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] while he was chairman of the Committee of the Whole respecting an amendment that was offered to an appropriation in the following form:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the agricultural college of any State or Territory until the Secretary of Agriculture shall be satisfied, and shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, that no trustee, officer, or employee of such college is engaged in the practice of polygamy or polygamous relations.

A point of order was made to that amendment, and the gentleman from New York, now the distinguished leader of this side of the House, held the amendment to be in order. There is no question that the amendment was in order. The House has a right in making appropriations for the maintenance of Soldiers' Homes to say that no part of the money it appropriates for those Homes shall be expended or available for the support of a Home, not that permits polygamy within its borders, but for the support of a Home that runs or permits a saloon or canteen where intoxicating liquors are sold to the inmates of the Home. It seems to me that there can be no question about the point of order. If the amendment is in due form, it is a limitation. It limits the appropriation; withholds the appropriation from a certain class of public institutions. It does not legislate canteens out of Soldiers' Homes. An appropriation bill may appropriate money for the support of the Departments, for the pay of clerks. It can not contain legislation that no female clerk, for example, shall be employed in a Department, but it can contain a provision that no part of the appropriation shall be available for the purpose of paying the salary of any female clerk, and that would be entirely in order. That is the office of a limitation, and therefore I think, Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana address himself to the question as to whether or not there is a difference between the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas and the usual form of a limitation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know. If I had been preparing the amendment I would not have put it exactly in the form in which the gentleman from Kansas has offered this amendment. There may be something in the form. If the Chair please, I have not addressed myself to the question of form, I have assumed that it is in the form of a limitation. If there be objection to the form, that is another question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, under the language of this amendment it would be impossible to maintain a Soldiers' Home without prohibiting the sale of beer, which is the only beverage now sold. That is sold under rules and regulations prescribed by the Board, and these rules and regulations are made by the Board under the act incorporating the Board, and so far as the governing of the Homes is concerned.

To the extent, therefore, that this amendment would restrict the Board in its power to make rules to that extent this limitation changes existing law. I think it is clearly subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota state the existing law?

Mr. TAWNEY. The existing law authorizes the National Board to make such rules and regulations as in the discretion of the Board may be deemed necessary. This is a clear limitation not only on the law which authorizes that to be done, but a limitation upon their discretion in the matter of making rules and regulations for the maintenance of the Homes and the care of the inmates.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether there is any law anywhere that authorizes canteens in any Soldiers' Home?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; except the law which gives to the National Board in charge of the Homes the right to determine by rules and regulations what may be done by the inmates or in the management of these Homes. The law has vested this discretion absolutely in the Board, and in the exercise of that discretion they have restricted the sale of all intoxicating liquors in the Homes to beer alone, and to beer of the mildest form, not to exceed, if I am correct, 3 per cent in alcohol.

Mr. OTJEN. I think it is 2 per cent.

Mr. TAWNEY. Two or 3 per cent, and that is fixed by regulation. Now, to the extent that this amendment takes away from the Board the power of determining what shall be done in this respect or in regard to the management of the Homes it changes existing law.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the proposed amendment is a mere limitation upon the appropriation proposed to be made.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is true it is a limitation on the appropriation, but a limitation that changes existing law, and my understanding is that limitations of that character are not in order. These are National Homes; they have been established by national law, and the people who are assigned to these Homes go there by virtue of that law and under such rules and regulations as are prescribed by the Board created by that law. Now, then, if the Board does not see fit to obey this change and continues under their rules and regulations to sell beer in the mild form in which it is now sold, then, of course, there would be no appropriation available whatever for the maintenance of the Homes and their inmates. This takes from the Board the power it now possesses under existing law in this respect. It may be negative legislation, but that fact does not overcome the fact that the changes it effects in existing law makes it out of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio that the continuance of canteens at National Soldiers' Homes is only by virtue of the power now vested in the Managers to prescribe rules and regulations does not in anywise contravene the House rule that any limitation that supersedes the power in the executive officers to determine regulations in any matter is new legislation in violation of Rule XXI. I wish to call the attention of the Chair, in confirmation of that contention, to page 353 of the Manual, where it says:

It has been generally held that provisions giving a new construction of law or limiting the discretion which has been exercised by officers charged with the duties of administration are changes of law within the meaning of the rule.

And added thereto are numerous citations, one as recent as the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, pages 2438 and 2440.

Further, if the Chair please, that decision rendered two years ago by the then chairman, when the sundry civil bill was under consideration, related to State Soldiers' Homes. I will contend, when that section is before the committee, that it also is subject to a point of order, but there is this distinction, which renders that citation not an authority in this case, because that was a limitation on an appropriation for State Homes, over which the National Government had no jurisdiction whatever. We were there providing an appropriation on the basis of $100 per head for each soldier contained in the State Homes, and that was the only way we could reach that subject.

I will ask the gentleman from Kansas, who has proposed this measure, and I shall contend to the Chair that if this proviso were in the form of a direction that no part of this appropriation should be used at any time unless canteens were established, could it be contended that that was not new legislation?

It would be a direction to establish canteens. The fact that they are now in existence, under the discretion vested in the Board of Managers, does not in any wise change the rule, for it is the same as existing law, and to overcome that practice legislation would be needed.

There is one other point to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair, and I desire to urge this point very strongly, and that is that the proposed amendment comes too late. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the various eight or ten items in the bill that have just been read, beginning with the provision for the Home at Dayton, followed by that at Milwaukee, followed by that at Togus, Me.; at Hampton, Va.; at Leavenworth, at Santa Monica, at Marion, at Danville, at Mountain Branch, and other places, and I call attention to the fact that each of those provisions is complete in itself. At the end of each there is the clause, including the total amount of appropriations there provided for the separate maintenance of each. Could it be contended for one minute that if at the end of this bill it should state the total aggregate amount of all these various appropriations—in all, $109,000,000—that then an amendment relating to some appropriation in the bill limiting the use of it to places where no canteens would be established would be in order? Yet the gentleman offers it now, and it can only have that effect. He offers it to the last section, which refers to the appropriation for the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, which is complete in itself, and then follows the phraseology in the two lines, "in all, $4,202,944."

In some of the sections referring to these separate establishments there is not one word in which there is an appropriation for anything that could be used for the purpose of sustaining a canteen. Take, for instance, that at Dayton and that at Milwaukee. There is nothing in those appropriations which provides for the purchase of beer or any beverage whatsoever. If the Chair is going to hold that this amendment is now in order to extend to all the various sections that have been read, then it must follow that if there was a provision at the end of the bill, as there is usually in all these supply bills, to the effect "in all, etc.," giving the aggregate amount provided for, it must follow of necessity that an amendment, such as the one proposed now, would be in order to limit a section which is complete in itself in any portion of the bill. If for no other reason, I claim the amendment should not be entertained to the prior sections, for it comes too late, and it can not refer to any section except this particular one—the last section just read. Perhaps that is all the gentleman intends it to cover, because I know of no reason, no matter how strong a Prohibitionist he may be, why it should apply to the Home located in Milwaukee. He may know of some conditions that make it pertinent and why it should apply to the Home at Battle Mountain, but if the Chair is going to hold that it is now in order to have it relate to sections already passed, then it will be in order at the conclusion of the bill, if there is a total appropriation in the clause provided, to have an amendment which will limit any section of the bill that has been gone over and passed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to supplement what I said a moment ago in respect to the power of the Board under existing law in regard to the government of these Homes. I read section 1 of the act of March 21, 1866:

National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and have perpetual succession, powers to take, hold, and convey real and personal property, establish a common seal, and sue and be sued in courts of law and equity, and to make by-laws, rules, and regulations for carrying on the business and government of the asylum, and affix penalties therefor.

That is the law. Now, I submit that this amendment is clearly a limitation upon the power of the Board, a limitation that absolutely changes the law which controls and governs the action of the Board of Managers in the management of these Homes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman permit a question upon that proposition in that connection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman will admit that the heads of Departments have the power to employ clerks over 60 years of age. Would it not be a proper limitation to attach to any amendment or any appropriation for the payment of clerical force in the Departments a provision that no part of this appropriation shall be available for the payment of any clerk over the age of 60 years? That does not change the law or take away the power of the head of a Department to employ men over 60 years of age, but it does declare the purpose of Congress not to appropriate for that class of men that the Department may employ. Would not that be a proper limitation?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. First, his premise is not at all analogous to this situation. The head of a Department has no power to employ a clerk at all unless Congress has previously authorized such employment. In determining the individual who shall be employed in a certain position, it may be, and it is a fact, that the head of the Department, subject to the rules and the civil-service law, determines who that particular individual shall be; but, Mr. Chairman, the head of the Department is not clothed by law with the power of governing his entire Department. He must govern that Department under specific legislation enacted by Congress. I will read the whole of that section. I observe that I omitted the first half of it, which is on page 9 of the laws and regulations of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Chief Justice of the United States, and such other persons as from time to time may hereafter be associated with them, according to the provisions of this act, are hereby constituted and established a board of managers of an establishment for the care and relief of the disabled volunteers of the United States Army, to be known by the name and style of the "National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers."

This board as constituted by law consists of the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the Chief Justice of the United States, and such others as are associated with them under the provisions of this act; and what power has Congress vested in them? They are to have perpetual succession, with power to take, hold, and convey real and personal property, establish a common seal and sue and be sued in courts of law and equity, and to make by-laws, rules, and regulations for carrying on the business and government of the asylum, and to affix penalties therefor. In other words, Mr. Chairman, Congress has clothed this board with plenary power in respect to the government of the Home, and any limitation upon an appropriation made for their maintenance that destroys any part of that power or discretion that this act vests in the board operates as a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas is not subject to the point of order, but is in order. It is very clear that the mere fact that it seeks to impose a limitation upon the appropriation is not a valid objection to it. It has been repeatedly held in this House, and is an invariable precedent, that the House may provide that no part of an appropriation shall be used except in a certain way, even though Executive discretion be thereby restricted. Whatever may have been the opinion of the Chair had this proposition been presented to the present occupant of the chair originally, the precedents limit the present occupant of the chair to this decision. The idea of limitation on an appropriation bill has been, according to the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, carried to extremes in some instances, but precedents on this point are well established, and the Chair will cite one instance that seems to show conclusively that this amendment or any other amendment of a negative character upon an appropriation bill is not subject to the point of order. On the 31st of March, 1904, the sundry civil appropriation bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and this amendment was offered:

That all carriages and other vehicles used in the public service other than for personal purposes, as authorized in section 2 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1905, the expense for purchase or maintaining, driving or operating of which are paid for by money appropriated by this act, shall have conspicuously painted thereon at all times the full name of the Executive Department or other branch of the public service for which the same belong and in the service of which the same are used.

The Chair desires to call attention to the fact that this is an affirmative provision. Mr. JAMES W. MANN, of Illinois, thereupon made the point of order that the paragraph was new legislation. The Chairman sustained the point of order. Thereupon Mr. JAMES A. HEMENWAY, from Indiana, proposed a new paragraph, and the Chair will call attention to the fact that it is in the negative form, in this language:

No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for purchase, maintenance, driving, or operating of any carriage or other vehicle other than authorized for personal purposes in section 2 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1905, unless the same shall have conspicuously painted thereon at all times the full name of the Executive Department or other branch of public service to which the same belong and in the service of which the same are used.

And after much discussion the Chair held that this did not change existing law, but was merely a limitation.

It would seem that this legislative body was very much lacking in power if there could not be a provision in the way of a limitation that carriages used for public purposes should have a designation upon them to that effect. The Chair is not led to think that any parliamentary rule makes that other than a limitation.

But the question under consideration has been squarely presented in this body and has been directly decided. On the 31st of March, 1904, the sundry civil appropriation bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and this amendment was proposed by Mr. Bell of California:

That no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home until its laws, rules, or regulations respecting the pensions of its inmates be made to conform to the provisions of section 4 of an act approved March 3, 1893, entitled "An act prescribing regulations for the Soldiers' Home located at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" but the above proviso shall not apply to any State or Territorial Home into which the wives or widows of soldiers are admitted and maintained; And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home that maintains a bar or canteen where intoxicating liquors are sold.

Which is, in substance, the same provision as that now proposed by the gentleman from Kansas. Mr. JAMES A. HEMENWAY made the point of order that the proposed amendment would change existing law, and thereupon the Chairman, Mr. BURTON of Ohio, rendered an elaborate decision. The Chair will not take time to read it, but the substance of it is in this paragraph:

The question arises as to whether this is a limitation merely. If so, the amendment is in order. If not, it is out of order. It is maintained that this amendment changes existing law. In a sense, every limitation changes existing law. If any specific condition is mentioned under which an appropriation is to be withheld, that is, pro tanto, a change of existing law, at least to the extent that the whole or a part of the appropriation can not be expended unless the condition is complied with.

And after other suggestions of like character the Chair overruled the point of order.

Directly in point on this proposition the Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to a decision made on the 30th day of January, 1901, when the agricultural appropriation bill was under discussion in the House—a decision rendered by the Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, sitting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. An amendment was offered by Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS, of Indiana, of the following tenor:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation shall be available for the Agricultural College of Utah until the Secretary of Agriculture shall be satisfied, and shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, that no trustee, officer, instructor, or employee of such college is engaged in the practice of polygamy or polygamous relations.

After much discussion on this amendment, Mr. PAYNE held that it was a limitation of an appropriation, which the House had the right to make and Congress had the right to make, and was not new legislation.

Under these holdings, the precedents pointing clearly, in the opinion of the Chair, to the fact that this is not obnoxious to the rule, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, on the merits of this resolution I desire to say a few words. One of these National Homes is in the district that I represent. I hope that this amendment will be defeated. If these were Homes for young men, for boys, there might be some good reason to offer such an amendment. But the men who occupy these Homes are old men. Their habits are all fixed, and will not in the least be affected by having a canteen run upon the ground. There are those in the Homes who will have their drink, and it is a great deal better for them to have it upon the grounds, where there is some control, some regulation. The beer they get upon the ground is specially brewed, with a very small amount of alcohol therein. By closing the canteen in the Homes, you will simply drive these men out to get their drink among saloons where there is no regulation or control. The money that is derived from these canteens is used for their amusement, for their reading room, the support in part of their band, and the rest goes to the post fund. Now, it seems to me, it is not for the benefit of the Homes to adopt this amendment. Those people who believe that they are doing the old soldier a benefit by prohibiting the running of a canteen upon the ground are, in my judgment, mistaken. Instead of doing him a benefit, I believe by this course you will do him a decided harm. I hope this amendment will be defeated.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, I have been much interested in this matter, and have made some investigation to ascertain what the facts are relative to the amount of drinking and intoxication connected with National Homes where the canteen exists and where it does not exist. But before I come to this I desire to call the attention of the committee to the line of legislation which the National Government has adopted in regard to this matter. There has been a constant but slow progression along the same line. We find that by the order of the Secretary of the Navy, made in 1868, although not required by law, the sale of intoxicating liquors was prohibited on board naval ships and in navy-yards and workshops. By the law, approved in 1901, liquor selling is forbidden at all military posts, exchanges, and upon all premises and in all buildings used for military purposes. Congress in 1902 prohibited the sale of liquors in the immigrant stations and in the National Capitol at Washington. Congress, by a law approved in 1904, refused aid to State soldiers' homes, as theretofore had been done, which maintained a bar or canteen for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and thus effectively secured the prohibition of such sale.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. TIRRELL. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly state what prohibition paper he is reading from?

Mr. TIRRELL. It is one that would give the gentleman a great deal of good and benefit if he would read it occasionally.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who prepared the article?

Mr. TIRRELL. The question is not one as to who wrote the article, but are the statements made in that article true and can you deny them? I want to say to the gentleman, and to the other Members of this House, there has never been one step backward taken by the National Government in regard to this matter, and the only places now where intoxicating liquors are allowed to be sold under its auspices are, as far as I can ascertain, in the National Soldiers' Homes, on the reservation at Hot Springs, Ark., where a hotel has been erected, and where, although the Government has not authorized it, the sale of liquor, I understand, is permitted in the hotels in the Yellowstone National Park. Practically the only places now in buildings or upon grounds which are controlled by the Government of the United States where intoxicating liquor is allowed are in the National Soldiers' Homes. They have been eliminated everywhere else.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman asked me whether I could controvert any assertion he has made in his remarks. I would like to ask the gentleman if his statement is based upon observation as to the sale of liquor in National Soldiers' Homes, to specify which National Home he is acquainted with, and whether he saw any liquor sold to any intoxicated old soldier in the canteen connected with the Home?

Mr. TIRRELL. I am delighted to give the gentleman any information which I can. In order that there may be no mistake about it, I wish to make the following statement: I had occasion a few years ago to send my partner, F. N. Adams, down to the National Soldiers' Home, located at Togus, Me., in a prohibitory State; and that I may exactly state what he saw down there, where they maintain a canteen, I had him put in writing the result of his observations, and I will read it for the enlightenment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then your statement is based upon the talk with your partner, not upon your own observation?

Mr. TIRRELL. No one can dispute the accuracy of this statement, and it never has been disputed so far as I know:

> Some years ago I had occasion to go to the Togus Home. I took the Kennebec boat. In the hold, to my surprise, I found a large number of beer and ale barrels. Wondering where they could be disposed of in the State of Maine, I inquired and found that they were for the Home at Togus. I spent one day at the Home on the grounds. I did not go into any building. Noticing a continuous stream of people going into one of the buildings, I inquired what it was, and was told it was the canteen. * * * The soldiers having pensions were allowed to spend it as they saw fit. If a man had no penston, he was allowed tobacco and beer tickets. A building was pointed out to me where patients suffering from alcohol were treated. It was "dubbed" the "Keeley cure."
> On one side of the Home they had a canteen for the soldiers to go to and on the other side they had the Keeley cure; in one building to get the drinks and the other building to get rid of its evil effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes, and I would like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman read that part of the letter which is authority for the statement or that bears upon the fact of the condition that these old soldiers were in when they entered or when they came from this building which the gentleman stated was a canteen—I did not hear anything referring to that read—whether any of those old soldiers were under the influence of liquor at any time?

Mr. TIRRELL. He said he went on the grounds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will you kindly read that part of the letter where it states that they became drunk after visiting this building?

Mr. TIRRELL. I can not spend any more time on that question. Where they maintain a canteen that condition exists, and where the canteen is not in force, there will be very little of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the committee to infer from the fact that the gentleman does not read anything in support of his statement that there is nothing in that letter that shows that any old soldier was drunk after leaving the canteen? I ask you to read that part to the House, if you will.

Mr. TIRRELL. There is nothing further in reference to the matter in it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing to show that these old soldiers became drunk when they went into this canteen? I thought the gentleman rose to read that letter for the purpose of showing that that was the fact.

Mr. TIRRELL. I rose to state to you the fact that there was a canteen at that time, and I presume now, maintained at the Togus, Me., Home, as well as the facts to which I have adverted in that letter.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no dispute about that fact. There is no dispute about the canteen being maintained. You were trying to prove that the soldiers become drunk by frequenting this post exchange at the Maine Soldiers' Home, and you have not presented one scintilla of evidence to bear out that contention.

Mr. TIRRELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, anyone going to the National Soldiers' Home at Phœbus, in Virginia, will see the argument at once refuted that if you have a canteen upon the grounds there will not be drinking outside. There is a road a mile or a mile and a half long from the village of Hampton to the entrance to the Soldiers' Home. On that road there are some thirty-five saloons, and anyone passing along the road will see all the way from one to a dozen veterans, inmates of that Home, hanging around any one of those saloons, and on the piazzas of these dives, in a state of greater or less intoxication.

Mr. OTJEN. I should like to ask the gentleman, if the canteen was not at the Soldiers' Home, would there not probably be a great many more soldiers at the saloons?

Mr. TIRRELL. There would not, for this reason, in my opinion: The old soldier has his appetite whetted by the beer and ale which he obtains in the canteen. It is true he can not get anything stronger there, but with his appetite whetted and his passion for liquor aroused, he goes outside to the dives and there drinks to excess; so that instead of lessening the amount of dissipation and intoxication you increase it, and the statistics which have been gathered of the various Soldiers' Homes show this to be the fact.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. How do the soldiers in the Regular Army have their appetites whetted, since the abolishment of the canteen at the post exchange, when they frequent the saloons without the post, since they can not get anything to drink at the post exchange?

Mr. TIRRELL. Oh, I can not answer that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is unanswerable.

Mr. TIRRELL. Now, I want to give an illustration, which is right in point in regard to this matter. There is a Soldiers' Home out in one of the Westren States, at Marion—I think—Indiana, where until the last two years no canteen was maintained. A canteen was put into that Home two years ago, and the statistics show that crime and disorder have increased in that Home 25 per cent since the canteen was established there.

[The time of Mr. TIRRELL having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not remarkable that if the canteen reduces the use of beer all the beer makers are in favor of it?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes, certainly; that is a conclusive argument.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. The Home to which the gentleman refers is in the district that I represent. For that reason I am interested in it. Does the gentleman state as a fact that the increase of crime has been 25 per cent in the last two years?

Mr. TIRRELL. The increase in the arrests made in that Home.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. There has been an increase of 25 per cent in the number of arrests in that Soldiers' Home in the last two years?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes; those are the figures which have been furnished me, 25 per cent greater than two years ago.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman well enough acquainted with the operation of these bars or canteens to describe them to us? I do not see how the appropriation is concerned in the maintenance of the bar. I understood that the liquor was sold at these canteens in the way in which it is sold at some clubs. Is it possible that the Government runs the bar and that the appropriation goes for liquor sold to the soldiers?

Mr. TIRRELL. I am unable to state to the gentleman the exact manner in which the canteens are conducted. Mr. Chairman, I want to give an illustration right here in Washington that shows that the position taken by those in favor of this amendment is absolutely correct. It has been my fortune during the last five years I have been in Congress to be able to go to the National Soldiers' Home here in Washington, and all over the grounds of that Home at least twenty-five times. I have seen hundreds of soldiers on those grounds, and never yet have I seen one of them in the slightest degree under the influence of liquor. Now, it is well known here in Washington that not only is no canteen allowed in the National Soldiers' Home, but that no saloon is allowed to be licensed within 1 mile of that place. The ebriety, the good conduct, and the fair reputation maintained by the National Soldiers' Home here in Washington is an irrefutable argument in favor of the enactment of this amendment, which will likewise exclude the canteen from the National Soldiers' Homes throughout the country.

Mr. WACHTER. Has the gentleman been to the National Soldiers' Home at Hampton, Va.?

Mr. TIRRELL. I have, many times.

Mr. WACHTER. Have you seen those dives around the National Soldiers' Home there?

Mr. TIRRELL. I have.

Mr. WACHTER. Have you seen the soldiers around there drunk and dilapidated?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. WACHTER. Don't you think the Government would have more control over those men if their liquor could be obtained within the reservation? Nothing but beer is sold there.

Mr. TIRRELL. What I would do would be to have a law down there similar to what they have in Washington; they should not be allowed a license.

Mr. WACHTER. The conditions there are a disgrace.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me, I would like to ask what figures he has showing an increase or decrease in other Homes that are without the canteen?

Mr. TIRRELL. I haven't any. Now, Mr. Chairman, the last reason I wish to give is that I do not believe the National Government should be engaged in the liquor business. There are millions of reputable and Christian people in this country that are opposed to the National Government allowing canteens in Soldiers' Homes, and we ought at least to respect the sentiment of the Christian people of this land, of those who are opposed from conscientious and moral and religious principles to the Government engaging in this traffic. We shock the moral and religious sensibilities of millions of American citizens by enacting laws here by which the old soldier is sent down to his ruin. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, the canteen, which is the polite word for saloon—nothing more and nothing less—is not necessary in National Homes or in State Soldiers' Homes. If it is, then the National Home right here within the limits of this District is doing without a necessity, and doing well. I want to say, inasmuch as I have been to that Home repeatedly, that I have been proud of the men who have fought under the flag in the conduct that they bear toward each other and toward citizens within and without the inclosure. There is no intoxication there, no obscenity, no unseemly conduct which so often travels side by side with the man under the influence of intoxicating liquors, whether he gets them and under whatever circumstances.

Again, it is not a necessity in our State Homes; all of them are without it, and they all seem to be in good condition. Congress said to the board of managers of every State Home in the Union and in the Territories: "You can not have one dollar of the money of the United States for maintenance of the inmates of the Home if you allow a canteen." We put a prohibition upon the State Homes. Congress says to the old soldiers in the State Homes, "You shall not have the canteen, or, if you do, you can not have any money out of the United States Treasury to maintain your Home." That is the limitation put upon this appropriation for the State Homes.

There can be no question about it in the minds of observing men that intoxicating liquor everywhere leads to misconduct, and often to that condition where you and I are ashamed of our fellow-men.

Let the Government throw around these old men, morally weak, as some of them are, its shield of protection in their declining years, and let it help them to build up the wasted manhood of their earlier years and live the evening of life temperate, sober, upright, worthy citizens, as we all wish and hope for them all to be and as the great body of them now are. I hope, gentlemen, we may do by all of the National Homes as we have done by this one in Washington, and that we may ask no more of the old soldiers in the State Homes than we willingly allow those in the National Homes. They all fought under the same flag, many of them side by side, and yet you say to one class, "You shall not," and you say to another, "You may." [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that what we are discussing is not the question between prohibition and the saloon at all. The question of prohibition generally does not enter into this discussion, nor do the arguments which support prohibition support the amendment which is offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BOWERSOCK]. These halls in the National Homes are not saloons. They are free from all of the contaminating influences found in the lower-class saloons. The general public is not admitted; it is a company of choice spirits that assemble there—the old soldiers of the Union, some who have fought in one, some in two wars of this country. I do not think Members of this House will say that the old soldier who takes a glass of beer not containing more than 2 per cent of alcoholic strength with any of these men who fought with him under the flag is in bad company or in danger of contamination. There is no liquor question involved in this discussion. If the liquor interests generally were consulted, I do not believe they would take action one way or the other. If you shut down the canteen in the Soldiers' Home, you will inevitably increase the sale of liquors in the saloons surrounding that Home, and if the saloon men in the vicinity of the Soldiers' Home were consulted on the question, they would vote to strike down the canteen in order to increase their sales.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. How much does the gentleman think the sale of liquor is increased here in Washington by virtue of the prohibition cut here in the Soldiers' Home?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will only say this in answer to the gentleman. I have no statistics. None have been furnished to us; but if the capacity of the old soldier is as great as the proponents of this amendment assert—because they say it is an evil to drink beer in the canteens in the Soldiers' Home, and it can not be an evil unless his capacity is great—if his capacity is as great as they say, the consumption in the saloons surrounding that Home will very largely increase. I answer the gentlemen upon their own premises. They are not mine.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the Soldiers' Home in the District, referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER], there is no liquor sold, or on the reservation or within a mile of the reservation, and there can not be, because Congress has passed a law. Congress has absolute control over that matter, and can, therefore, control the sale of liquor in the vicinity of the Home, which it can not do in the National Homes outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think that is a very valuable suggestion. The conditions in the District of Columbia do not apply to the other Soldiers' Homes which we are discussing now.

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to reply to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would prefer that the gentleman reply in his own time.

Mr. WACHTER. I will only take a moment—that the land surrounding the Hampton Soldiers' Home is also Government territory, and the worst kind of a condition exists there.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I wish also to call the attention of the House to one further fact, and that is that the considerations which were urged upon Congress at the time the sale of liquor was prohibited in the navy-yards, the immigration stations, and in the Capitol are not the same as the considerations which we must regard in this case. I think every man will agree that it was a wise thing to abolish the sale of liquor in the National Capitol—not that I believe any considerable number of legislators would allow themselves to get under the influence of intoxicating liquor; but there are a great many visitors, many constituent visitors, and the time consumed in social pastime would have derogated seriously from the value of the services of the legislators. So, too, there can be no earthly justification for the sale of liquor at immigrant stations, and Congress acted wisely in abolishing the sale there. Neither can there be any justification for its sale in the navy-yard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Well, the gentleman is not obliged to, of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Still, I must for the side that I am representing just now. It has been stated here, I think by the gentleman, certainly by some one arguing from his standpoint of view, that the Government puts a prohibition around this Home here, and I want to say now, for fear I may be under suspicion, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] did not make the suggestion that I am about to make. What does the Government do in the State of Maine? It carries into a State where the State law prohibits the sale of liquor a saloon and tons of intoxicating liquor and sells it in a prohibition State.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, with the gentleman's permission, I shall proceed. I will say that the considerations which apply to these other cases do not apply to this. You are dealing there with men in all ranks of life and of various ages. In this case you are dealing with men of advanced age, mostly above 60 years of age—men whose habits have become fixed. Many of them have become accustomed to the use of liquor in some form in their youth and in the prime of their lives. Would it not be a hardship to cut that practice off now, after they have served their country so well and have attained the age of 60 years? What would be an easy thing for a man of 30 to do might become a hardship for a man of 60. I myself could easily decide never to use intoxicating liquor through the whole course of my life without injury to my health, but if I arrived at the age of 65 or 70, having persevered in the use of liquor, I am not at all certain that I could abandon it then without incurring danger of physical injury, and that is what is likely to result with these old men. If you stop them from getting it in Solders' Homes, what will you do? You will drive them out into the adjacent territory and make them fall prey to the saloon keeper and the dive keeper and subject them to all sorts of contaminating influences. You gentlemen who in supporting this amendment are seeking to befriend the old soldier are actually dealing him a blow. You are doing him an injury. I want to read to the House the statement of a manager of a Soldiers' Home. There were three of them before the committee—General Henderson, who was formerly a Member of this House; Major Harris, and ex-Governor Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey. They stated before the committee, or Major Harris did—he was their spokesman, and he made the statement in their presence—that the canteen as conducted in the National Soldiers' Homes was not a detriment but a benefit to the soldiers, and that they preferred to have it remain. One of the members of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW], is one of the managers of the Board in control over Soldiers' Homes.

A gentleman appeared before that committee in opposition to the continuation of the canteen, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW], as a result of his experience as a manager, made this statement, to which I respectfully ask the House to listen:

Mr. BROWNLOW. I want to call your attention to one fact: There is not and has not been in the United States any man more fanatical on the subject of the use of intoxicating drinks than myself. I never tasted a drop of whisky, wine, or beer; I never smoked a cigar, and I never took a chew of tobacco.

And I went into the management of the Mountain Branch Home as much prejudiced against the sale of intoxicating drinks in any way, shape, form, or fashion as any man in this country. But after careful investigation, after visiting all of the National Homes, and after going in there and making a diligent search for all of these things that you complain of, I came to the conclusion that the canteen in the Home was an absolute protection to those who were addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors.

And now I commend the House to this simple statement of a severe and lifelong prohibitionist, based upon his observation as a manager of National Homes, who has the welfare of these soldiers at heart, and who is not willing to be moved by clamor created by a bureau at the dictation of fanatical persons in the community.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to ask my colleague one question: Whether any managers of the Soldiers' Home or any superintendents of the Soldiers' Home appeared before the committee directly or indirectly in favor of this legislation?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will say that members of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes were present, the three I have named—Major Harris, General Henderson, formerly a Member of this House, and ex-Governor Murphy, of New Jersey. Major Harris was their spokesman, and I directly interrogated him upon this point, and the answer he made was that it was a beneficial thing and that it ought to be retained. The other two sat there and heard what he said and evidently approved it.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that I can not agree with my distinguished friend and comrade from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER]. This is not a question on which to theorize, but one that resolves itself in its final analysis to that of actual experience. For the last five years I have had the honor of being trustee of the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, located at Bath, with an average number of inmates of 2,000. Our experience during the past two years without the canteen as compared with previous years has been unfortunate. May I be permitted to describe what really constitutes a canteen, as I understand it, and as it was the practice at the Bath Home for many years. It is simply a reading room; a place of amusement and entertainment, where the men assemble and play checkers, chess, or read and talk while enjoying their glass of beer and pipe. They are absolutely limited to beer and ale, with no other intoxicating liquor on the premises. They are obliged to buy their checks from the cashier, who is employed by the Board of Managers under strict rules and regulations, and no man is allowed more than one or two glasses of beer during a visit. Now, as I said, Mr. Chairman, this is a question of actual experience and practical knowledge. It is not a matter of prohibition or license to sell liquor. [Applause.] I hold in my hand——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would like to know wherein the gentleman's description of his Soldiers' Home canteen differs from that of an ordinary saloon in so far as games and reading is concerned, except in the limitation put upon the amount that you may drink? Now, I want to say right here, if you will allow me, and I will move for more time if you so desire——

Mr. GOULDEN. Thank you.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I did not suppose the bar, as my friend from Pennsylvania calls it, was in the reading room or the room where men could play games and cards and go up and pay their debts at the bar. I supposed that the money that was derived from the sale of intoxicating liquors, or the bar if you call it so, was used to furnish some chosen room where men of all classes met—and to many men it is offensive to be where drinking is going on (excuse me for taking so much time)—but I am sorry if New York State compels the nondrinking soldiers to enjoy the privileges of the reading room and the social room in the midst of a drinking room.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is not the case, Mr. Chairman. They have a very large auditorium fitted up for the purposes of a reading room and as a place of amusement, capable of seating twelve hundred men. But the difference between the canteen formerly at the Home and the ordinary saloon is, first, the limitation as to the amount; secondly, the limitation as to the kind of drink, and third, no game of chance or playing for the drinks was allowed. Therefore it differed entirely from them, and was in reality a club. The gentleman has visited clubs and I know has enjoyed their hospitality and good cheer and did not for a moment feel that he was in a saloon, nor did he think he was encouraging bar-room practices and customs. The profits, if any, from the canteen go into the post fund and are used for the amusement and good of the inmates. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Is not the gentleman in favor, by strict regulation, of restoring the saloon in this Capitol?

Mr. GOULDEN. No, sir.

Mr. SIMS. Why not?

Mr. GOULDEN. Because I believe it was an advantage to everyone generally at the Capitol to do away with it. It was not my good fortune, Mr. Chairman, to sit in this House when the gentleman from Tennessee and others enjoyed the privileges of a club in the House. Now, Mr. Chairman, the board of trustees of the Soldiers' Home at Bath is made up of nine members. In addition to that, the governor and secretary of state are ex officio members of the board. The president was for several years chairman of the Republican committee of the State of New York and is now at the head of the railroad commission—Col. George W. Dunn.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] asks that the time of his colleague [Mr. GOULDEN] be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RHODES. Is it true that the canteens in the various Soldiers' Homes throughout the country can sell beer only?

Mr. GOULDEN. I believe that is correct, and may I say that the reason assigned for this legislation two years ago was the fact that a Soldiers' Home failed to comply with regulations of that character, and sold all kinds of liquor? But that was the only exception in the entire thirty State and Territorial Homes of the country. That was in California. Of the other gentlemen on the board of trustees of the Bath Home, one is an ex-Member of this body, General McDougall, of Auburn. Another, Colonel Orr, is the pension agent at Buffalo. The board is made up of an excellent class of men. Under their direction this canteen has been in the past practically a club for the inmates of the Home.

I hold in my hand the resolution unanimously adopted by the board of trustees. It is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the board of trustees of the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home that the best interests of the institution and good of the members thereof will be subserved by the reestablishment at the Home of the canteen, at which only malt liquors are sold; and the board urgently requests the several Members of Congress from the State of New York to use their best endeavors to accomplish this result.

Adopted.

I certify that the foregoing is a correct copy of a resolution adopted by the board of trustees of the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home at a regular meeting held on the 9th day of November, 1905.

J. E. EWELL, Commandant.

The following is a letter from the commandant himself, formerly from Buffalo, and a well-recognized temperance advocate, one who has preached and practiced temperance for many years, and now commandant of the Bath Home, Col. Joseph E. Ewell.

NEW YORK STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME,
Bath, Steuben County, N. Y., December 29, 1905.

Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLONEL GOULDEN: In the year 1896 the legislature of this State authorized the trustees of this institution to sell beer and ale to members of the Home on the Home grounds, the profits to be used for the support of the library and reading room of the Home and for such purposes as might be deemed best for the comfort and amusement of the members. Under this authority beer and ale were sold on the Home grounds until May 1, 1904, when a "no-license" vote in the town of Bath, in which town the Home is situated, rendered further sale impossible for a period of two years. The town of Bath has now voted for license again, to take effect on May 1 next, so that after that period there will be no obstacle to the reestablishment of the canteen except such as have been or may be imposed by Congress. In the appropriation bill of 1904 making provision for payments on account of State Homes a provision was inserted that no part of the appropriation should be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home that maintains a bar or canteen where intoxicating liquors are sold. The same provision was also inserted in the supply bill of 1905. The trustees of this institution desire that the above condition be not attached to the supply bill of next year. They think that the "best interests of the institution and the good of the members will be subserved by the reestablishment of the canteen at which only malt liquors are sold." I concur in their view. The canteen is maintained at many of the National Homes, and, as far as I know, at all of them under authority of Congress. Why a distinction should be made between State and National Homes is not obvious. Another circumstance that has a strong bearing upon this subject is that all sorts of vile intoxicants are permitted to be sold in unlimited quantities in the immediate vicinity of the Home. The present no-license régime furnishes no protection whatever in this respect, and after May next such sales will be legal. It seems to me that to prohibit the sale of malt liquors on the grounds of the Home under proper restrictions and restraints while unlimited and unregulated sale of all sorts of intoxicants is permitted just outside the Home grounds does not appeal to good reason or sound judgment. It is to be hoped that the present Congress will take a different view of the matter from that held by its predecessor.

Respectfully,

J. E. EWELL, Commandant.

I will now read a letter from the surgeon—Dr. C. K. Haskell—in charge of the Home, as follows:

NEW YORK STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME,
Bath, Steuben County, N. Y., January 2, 1906.

Hon. J. A. GOULDEN, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Through the commandant I have been informed that you desire my opinion, along with others, as regards the advisability of reestablishing the so-called "canteen" at this Home.

After mature deliberation on the subject I am fully convinced that as a practical means for promoting temperance in the use of alcoholics as well as in conserving the health of the men by offering them a limited amount of a pure beverage (beer or ale) in place of the poisonous material obtainable at our gates the reestablishment of the post exchange should be advocated.

Respectfully, yours, C. K. HASKELL, Surgeon.

Also a letter from the Catholic chaplain of the Home, the Rev. John F. Farrell, under date of January 16, 1906, as follows:

NEW YORK STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME,
Bath, Steuben County, N. Y., January 16, 1906.

Hon. J. A. GOULDEN, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request, I send my views as to the advisability of returning to the canteen system in the Soldiers' Homes of the country.

I have been Catholic chaplain at the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home for nearly four years. When I began my work here I was opposed to the canteen, but experience has taught me that it is morally impossible to eradicate intemperance. The best we can do is to endeavor to control it. A large number of the inmates formed an appetite for intoxicating liquors early in life and now consider them essential. To my mind it would be far better to establish a canteen at this Home in which the men could obtain mild stimulants under proper restrictions than to practically force them to frequent the saloons, of which there are many in the proximate vicinity of the Home, where the vilest kind of liquors are generally sold.

I am, yours, sincerely,

JOHN F. FARRELL.

I desire also to allude to a letter written by the fiscal supervisor, Mr. Bender, of the State of New York, who inspects and examines all State institutions, of a recent date, in which he highly commends the management of the Bath Home.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just outside of the Home gates, and at other Soldiers' Homes, except the one here in Washington, are found a number of saloons. Just off the reservation at Bath twenty-five or thirty saloons of a questionable character are found.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to one further question?

Mr. GOULDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. You say just outside of the Home in your State and other States they have saloons. In the State from which I come it is prohibited. I merely suggest this to the gentleman, that New York and other States can do the same thing, if they will.

Mr. GOULDEN. But they have not done it. The fact remains that just outside of the reservation are twenty to twenty-five saloons, most of them of a doubtful character, and in most cases selling the vilest sort of stuff, much of which is rank poison; and these old men, my comrades and yours, may I say to the gentleman from Michigan, go and drink the liquor that is positively injurious to them. They not only take beer and ale, but the alleged whisky, brandy, and all sorts of concoctions that are sold, and their condition after a debauch on this sort of stimulant is a pitiable one. I believe it to be in the interest of good morals, of health, and to the comfort of the men who so well and loyally served their country in the civil war to maintain a well-regulated canteen. I believe it is to their interest and to the interest of a common humanity that Congress should reestablish the canteen in the State Soldiers and Sailors' Homes, of which there are thirty, with a population of nearly 20,000 old soldiers awaiting the last summons. There are ten National Homes, and I believe that I am fully justified in favoring its maintenance in these places and the reestablishment of the canteen in all the State Homes, and in the interest of the men who require some mild stimulant in the closing years of their long, useful, and heroic lives, I plead for my unfortunate comrades, and hope that the amendment will not prevail. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of engaging in a discussion of this question, and I agree with the suggestion of my friend from Massachusetts that this is not a question of the prohibitory law or a question of personal temperance, but is solely a question of the welfare of the men in the Homes. Now, I do not propose to discuss that as a matter of argument. I am not going to cite letters from officials or resolutions from people who are interested therein. I hope this committee simply wants the facts in relation to this situation, and I am going to give to the committee in a few minutes the benefit and result of an examination of the reports of five Soldiers' Homes for the purpose of ascertaining what the facts are in reference to their welfare in connection with this question. I am going to take one—that is, the National Home for Regulars, in Washington—in the District of Columbia as one of the standards, and that is a Home where for three years no intoxicating liquors of any kind have been sold. Now, it is true that there is a zone around that Home of 1 mile where liquors can not be sold, and to that extent that may differentiate it from some of the Homes to which I am going to call attention; but it is also true that an electric railroad runs close to the door of that Home, so that any one of those old soldiers who wants to visit any of the saloons of the city of Washington can do so any time he likes for 5 cents, or six tickets for 25 cents.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. Is it true, as the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests, that that 1-mile zone is known as "the Temperate Zone?" [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not know how that may be. I should hope that it might be. Now, I want to give an analysis of the reports of these Homes, so that the committee may have the benefit of this information; and upon that information I have no doubt every intelligent man can act understandingly.

Average number present in 1903 at the National Home for Regulars, at Washington, 1,414; total cases of discipline, 259; per cent, 0.183. The total number present, the average number, in the Central Branch, Dayton, Ohio, which has a canteen, was 4,729; total cases of discipline, 2,676; a percentage of 0.565, nearly three times as great a percentage as there was in the Washington Home. For bringing liquors into the grounds, National Home at Washington, D. C., 9; per cent, six-tenths of 1. Bringing intoxicating liquors into the Home at Dayton, Ohio, 334; per cent, 0.07 as against six-tenths of 1 per cent where there was no canteen. Drunk and disorderly in the National Home in Washington, 166; percentage, 0.117. In the Central Branch, of Dayton, Ohio, taking drunkenness on and off duty and penal sentences involving drunkeness, the aggregate per cent was 0.201, against 0.117, nearly twice as many where there was a canteen as where there was no canteen. Absent without leave, 74 in the Home in Washington, D. C.; absent without leave in Dayton, Ohio, 1,273; per cent in Washington, 0.052; per cent in Dayton, Ohio, 0.269.

Now, let me take the Southern Branch, Hampton, Va., for 1903, where there is also an electric railroad. I do not know what the zone may be. The average number present was 2,773, and the total cases of discipline were 1,287.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to continue my remarks while I complete the reading of these figures in connection with this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Total cases of discipline, 1,687; per cent of cases of discipline in Southern Branch, at Hampton, where there is a canteen, 0.608, as compared with 0.183 in Washington without the canteen. Bringing liquor into the grounds in Hampton, Va., 42; per cent 0.015, as against 0.006 where there is no canteen. Drunkenness, 1,077 in the Southern Branch, at Hampton, Va., as against 166; per cent in Hampton, Va., 0.388, as against 0.117; nearly four times as many in Hampton, Va., as in Washington, D. C. Absent without leave, 58; per cent 0.02; which is less than the per cent in Washington, D. C.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman right there permit a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any figures along the same lines of a Home for Volunteer Disabled Soldiers of the civil war without a canteen, rather than the Home in Washington, where soldiers are limited to those of the Regular Army, and therefore much younger in their average age?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have some figures in one Home for two years with a canteen and one year without.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that a Home for Volunteers?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I trust there is no particular difference.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a difference in ages, and necessarily in discipline between the two kinds of Homes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The soldiers in the Washington Home are older, with their habits very much more fixed. The distinction, if any, is against the Home here instead of in its favor.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not mean to say that the ages of the inmates of the Home in Washington are higher than the ages of the soldiers in the Homes for Volunteers?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. A member of the Committee on Appropriations informs me that that is the fact. I have no personal knowledge of it. I will ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] what the fact is.

Mr. STAFFORD. That can not be, for it goes without question that the Volunteer Homes, being limited to those soldiers who participated in the civil war, which ended forty-one years ago, and the Home here in Washington, being limited to soldiers of the Regular Army, who may be admitted to the Home at any time when they are injured, that the age of those soldiers in the Volunteer Homes must be much higher.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let me say to my distinguished friend, as to that I have no personal knowledge. I will ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] to state what the fact is; whether he has investigated it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have only this to say, that the service in the Regular Army is so long that is required for admission to the National Home that it is absolutely necessary that anybody in the National Home shall be an old man, unless he has been injured in the service; and as I have been out there and have seen them they are a body of old men.

Mr. STAFFORD. Have you not seen very many young men who have been disabled in the service who are inmates of that Home?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very, very few.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have seen quite a number of young men there.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will take the Northwestern Branch.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts excuse me until I finish these statistics? Then I will listen to his inquiry. I am not undertaking to argue this. I am simply giving the committee the benefit of the facts as they exist.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I want to give the gentleman some information.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not yield now. I will yield later. In the Northwestern Branch, Milwaukee, Wis., for 1903, with a canteen the average number present was 2,175; total cases of discipline, 953; per cent, 0.438 against 0.183 in the Washington Home without the canteen. Bringing intoxicating liquors within the Home grounds, 74, as against 9 in Washington; per cent, 0.034, as against 0.006 in Washington. Drunkenness, 362, with a per cent of 0.166, as against 166 in Washington with a per cent of 0.117. Absent without leave, 397; per cent, 0.182, as against 74 in the Home in Washington, with a per cent of 0.052.

Now, I would like to call attention to the Marion Branch, Marion, Ind., for two years without the canteen and a year with the canteen. I won't go over all the details. They are mainly volunteer soldiers in that Branch, as I am informed, but I do not know about that. I will take 1903 and compare it with 1905. At the Marion Branch, Marion, Ind., in 1903 the average number of persons present was 1,750. The total cases of discipline, 543; percentage, 0.31. In 1905, with the canteen, the average number present was 1,682; total cases of discipline, 737; percentage, 0.438, as against 31 per cent. That is an increase of 33⅓ per cent under the canteen as compared with the percentage without the canteen.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the meaning of the term "discipline?" What does it include?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. All cases of discipline.

Mr. TAWNEY. Intoxication and anything else?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Every infraction of discipline. I am giving the same class of figures with reference to 1903 and 1905, with the canteen and without the canteen, and there was in increase of 30 per cent under the canteen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not propose to argue the facts, but only to state the facts. Now, to go on: Bringing intoxicating liquors within the Home 68, per cent 0.038; that is, when no liquors were sold in the Home. Now, in 1905, with the canteen, the number bringing intoxicating liquors into the Home was 71, percentage 0.042, with liquor sold in the canteen, an increase over the period when it was not sold in the canteen. Drunkenness, 265 in 1903, percentage 0.151; drunkenness in 1905, with the canteen, 322, percentage 0.19, as against 0.151 without it.

Now, in 1903 I have not the figures in relation to being absent without leave, but I take those for 1904. They are as follows: Absent without leave 53, percentage 0.03; absent without leave in 1905, with the canteen, 220, percentage 0.13.

I leave this question, Mr. Chairman, with that statement of facts.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Maine yield for a moment?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. I hold in my hand a letter from the mayor of Marion, Ind., addressed to Col. George W. Steele, a former Member of this House, and governor of the National Military Home of Indiana, dated June 4, 1906, which reads as follows:

MARION, IND., June 4, 1906.

Col. GEORGE W. STEELE,
Governor National Military Home, Indiana.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I desire to congratulate you upon the results that you have obtained from the establishment of the canteen at the Home. I have talked with the superintendent of police and with a number of officers, and all are of the opinion that much good has been accomplished by the canteen. The condition of the old soldier on the streets of Marion is much different since the canteen went into effect. At pension time now the citizens are not annoyed by intoxicated old soldiers on the streets. The canteen has not only been of advantage to Marion and her people, but it also has resulted in much good to the old soldier who drinks, for drinking is a disease with him and he can not be cured. The only thing to do is to regulate him as much as possible in the use of intoxicating liquor, and the canteen successfully does this.

Yours, very truly, FIELD W. SWEZEY.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman want me to answer that? My answer to that is that the letter of the mayor congratulates the governor of that Home on the fact, first, that in cases of discipline where he had 31 per cent without the canteen he now has 0.438 per cent. Well, I suppose he is to be congratulated upon that result, an increase in the cases of discipline of about 30 per cent. Let the mayor congratulate him. If that is the kind of thing the mayor likes to congratulate him upon, that is the kind of thing the mayor likes.

Mr. TAWNEY. He states his reason, and that is the absence of drunkenness on the streets of Marion.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have stated facts. I am not wasting any time about reasons; I am not undertaking to argue upon those facts.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the gentleman from Michigan will allow me to finish this statement, I will then yield to him. The mayor goes further and congratulates Mr. Steele, a former Member of this House, on the fact that they have succeeded in bringing intoxicating liquor into the Home at the rate of 0.042 per cent under this present régime as against 0.038 under the former, a nice fact to congratulate Governor Steele upon. Upon the question of drunkenness, while the records of the Home show 0.19 per cent, about which he congratulates him, under the former state of facts it only shows 0.151 per cent. Now, if that is a legitimate subject of congratulation upon the part of the mayor of the city of Marion, Ind., I have to repeat if that is the kind of thing he likes to congratulate for, it shows about what he likes to congratulate for. I do not think it will appeal to the average good sense of the Members of this House. I have no criticism to make of the mayor; I am simply giving the facts as they appear. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman has said many times that he was giving us the facts. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell us just what source the figures he has given us come from and who collected them?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. They are the reports made by the Homes, and I stand behind their accuracy. Does that satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. YOUNG. Well, I do not see how the gentleman can stand behind their accuracy unless he himself compiled them or was aware of who compiled them.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I stand behind their accuracy. I can have the reports produced, however.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not question that the gentleman is quoting his authority correctly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will stand behind the accuracy of the statements. Does that satisfy the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman himself taken them from any official reports?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have had the reports handed to me this morning to bring in here for this purpose, but I told him I did not want these reports. I took the analysis.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the gentleman compile these figures himself from official reports?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; but I stand behind their accuracy. Does that satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. STAFFORD. No. I would like to know the authority for the figures which the gentleman has used in this discussion.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman wants to know the name of the gentleman who furnished this analysis?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I do not care for the name.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, I can give the name of the gentleman. His name is Edwin C. Dinwiddie.

Mr. STAFFORD. What position does he occupy?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He is superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League. [Laughter.] How does that affect it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, he is certainly an interested party.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly; if he had not been he would not have looked up the statistics.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Maine spoke of the percentage of cases of discipline at the Marion Home. Do those cases arise out of drunkenness, or can the gentleman give the proportion of cases arising out of drunkenness?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have given that already.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. But the gentleman spoke of discipline.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have given you cases of drunkenness, and the cases of discipline include all cases of discipline.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. There is no way in which the gentleman can tell the proportion which arises out of drunkenness?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I can give the gentleman the drunkenness—265, per cent 0.151 without the canteen; with the canteen, 332, per cent 0.19, an increase from 0.151 to 0.19 per cent, an increase of about 30 per cent under the canteen as compared to the period without the canteen.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the percentage of discipline increased pro rata with the increase of intoxication.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Almost every time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly; it always does.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. They go hand in hand.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in fifteen minutes.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. The figures the gentleman gave related to cases of arrest in the Home, did they not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will give the gentleman the exact statement in that respect. Total cases of discipline, and that means, I understand, all the cases of discipline in the Home—of course I am not able to state whether they were actually arrested in the Home or not.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. Has the gentleman any figures showing the increase or decrease of arrests of all old soldiers outside of the Home for intoxication?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have nothing of that kind.

Mr. KEIFER. They are connected with the other.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. All I can say about that is this——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Ask him if he knows anything about it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, the inquiry is entirely proper. I don't know what the fact is, but I assume the cases of drunkenness include all cases of drunkenness that came directly or indirectly to the knowledge of the persons in the Home. Of course the gentleman will appreciate the fact that the figures I gave are precisely the same for each year, and have the same relative weight and bearing, and of course if there are any arrests outside of the Home in 1905, that factor would also be present in 1903.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 18198) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. WETMORE, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6109. An act authorizing the reappointment of midshipmen recently dismissed from the Naval Academy for hazing;

S. 6167. An act to improve the channels along the New Jersey seacoast; and

S. 6375. An act granting lands in the former Uintah Indian Reservation to the corporation of the Episcopal Church in Utah.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 14968. An act to amend the internal-revenue laws so as to provide for publicity of its records.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close in fifteen minutes.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. SPERRY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SPERRY. For the purpose of discussing this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. SPERRY. Oh, I did not understand that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think that those who have argued this afternoon for the retention of the so-called "canteen" at National Homes are as much concerned in the welfare and the good interests of the old soldiers as those who have taken the opposite side, and it is because we are concerned with the protection of the old soldier that we seek to have the canteen retained. It is surprising, indeed, that the wives of Army and naval officers as distinguished as those of General Chaffee, Surgeon-General Sternberg, General Gillespie, General Schwan, Admiral Schley, and the widows of Admiral Sampson and General Kelton should have united with many other hundreds of estimable ladies in a petition to Congress dated December 15, 1904, petitioning for the reestablishment of the canteen in the Army posts throughout the country, if there was not some good reason for the retention of the canteen. In that petition they say:

> We do earnestly petition Congress to pass the bill that provides "that so much of the act approved February 2, 1901, as prohibits the sale of beer in any post exchange or canteen is hereby repealed."
> We make this petition after a careful study of the effect the prohibition of the sale of beer at post exchanges has had upon the enlisted man since February 2, 1901. We think that it is quite in order that we should add our voice in the interest of the moral and physical well-being of the soldier.

Certainly the wives of these eminent officers can not be questioned as to their interest in the welfare of those in the Regular Army. Nor can those advocating the retention of the canteen in the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers be questioned as to their interest in those, to use the language of the gentleman from Michigan, who are old, who are decrepit, who are weak, those whose habits are already formed. We desire as much as those advocating the abolishing of the canteen to see the mantle of protection thrown around them and to save them from the low haunts, the vicious places, which surround these Homes and always increase when the canteen is abolished from National or State Homes. I wish the gentleman from Maine could have furnished, even though the author had been the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, some figures showing the increased number of saloons that surround these Homes where the canteen has been abolished, showing the increase in drunkenness, showing the increased number of arrests. It is questionable whether any person can controvert the facts set forth in the letter of the mayor of Marion, which has been read by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota.

Is it not strange, gentlemen of the committee, that if this canteen has produced such dire effects as the gentleman from Maine would have you believe, that there has not been one Board of Managers of all these National Homes that has ever petitioned this Congress in their reports to have the canteen abolished? Are these Boards of Managers composed of estimable men, who are old soldiers themselves, in league with the liquor interests, in league with the beer interests? Are they desirous of dragging down the old soldiers? Is their one sole purpose to injure the soldiers instead of helping them, or is their course in retaining the canteen dictated from a knowledge gained after years and years of management of these Homes, that it is the best way to enforce discipline, the course to follow if the Homes are to be efficiently managed? This has been proved and confirmed by the Army officers in strongly urging the reestablishment of the canteen in the post exchanges, that it is necessary to have the canteen right on the post grounds, where mild beverages are sold which are not sufficient, except when taken in exorbitant quantities, to produce drunkenness, rather than have the soldiers seek saloons outside, where poor liquor is sold, and where, only too frequently, they are beset with vices that destroy all discipline.

This is not a question of prohibition. The speeches which have been made here to-day savor entirely of prohibition. It is purely a temperance question. If you believe in temperance, if you favor having mild beverages, such as beer and light wines, dispensed in the canteen of the National Homes, where the governor of the Home can control and regulate its use, as to-day under the regulations in force, rather than have the soldiers frequent the places without, where the governor has no control whatsoever, then you will vote down this amendment that can only result in dragging down rather than uplifting the old soldier, whom we are all concerned in guarding, helping, and elevating.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York very pleasantly and kindly said a while ago he did not happen to be here when we used to have a canteen running on the first floor of this Capitol, therefore I excuse him for not knowing the great difference there is in the conduct of this Capitol now and when we did have it. It is true, and Members of this House know it is true, that the per cent of drinking, the excessive use of intoxicating liquors has been visibly reduced, both as to the Members of the House and by the employees of the Capitol and by visitors——

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SIMS. In one moment—and it has been reduced simply by making it inconvenient. There never was a time or place when it was made more inconvenient to get intoxicating drinks, that there has not been less drinking—let them be old soldiers, young soldiers, Members of the House of Representatives, or anybody else. And why should we, who are taxing the people to keep up the Soldiers' Homes, stand here and vote to keep open saloons in those Homes, in order to keep the soldiers, as it is charged, from going outside and debauching themselves? I want to say that I do not believe there are very many of these old soldiers in these Homes who will go into dives, as has been represented by the gentleman from Wisconsin, if they do not have beer served in the Homes. If they are all so depraved, 5 cents' worth of beer a day will not keep them at the Homes. I do not believe there is a sufficient per cent of that depraved class among the old soldiers, as is here represented, as an argument for bringing the means of depravity to their doors, in order that their drinking may be concealed behind the doors of the Home.

Mr. STAFFORD. The generals of the Army state that has been the effect of the abolition of the canteen from the post exchanges.

Mr. SIMS. Well, I want to say it is a reflection upon the volunteer soldiery of this country to charge that a large per cent are so depraved that they will leave the Homes and go to dens of shame, if not provided with a more convenient resort in the way of a saloon in the Home.

Mr. GOULDEN. Going back a little to the conduct of the Members of this House, I would like to ask the gentleman whether there were not more arrests made at this session of Congress than at any other session?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SIMS. There may have been more arrests of Members for leaving the House and breaking a quorum than when we did have the canteen, but perhaps when they had the canteen here some of them were not in condition to be arrested and produced before the Speaker. If the gentleman desires any further information of that sort he can call for it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does not the gentleman realize when he speaks of selling liquor at the Capitol that there was sold here whisky, brandy, and other intoxicants? Does not the gentleman realize that in the canteens there is only light beer sold?

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, alcohol is alcohol. If there was no alcohol in beer the gentleman from New York would not give a nickel for 10 gallons of it. It is only the difference in the percentage of alcohol in beer, wine, whisky, or brandy. It is alcohol that does the work. [Applause.] If you take alcohol out of beer and wine you would not want any of it.

Mr. PADGETT. Is it not simply that beer and those light drinks might be treated as the devil's kindling wood?

Mr. SIMS. It creates a desire to take something stronger. The man that never takes beer will never want red liquor.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does not the gentleman think it is better to let the old soldier have his glass of beer than to allow him to go forth to the saloon in the neighborhood and outside of the reservation?

Mr. SIMS. Where is the old soldier that is asking for this legislation—I mean to put the saloon in the Home? They are not here. The men who are behind this movement are the men who expect to make money out of having these saloons for the old soldiers in the Government-supported Homes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, is recognized for the last five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that members of the committee are proceeding in this discussion upon a wrong theory. They have been discussing this amendment upon the theory that we are about to legislate as though the proposed amendment was intended to regulate the morals and habits of all classes of society. In other words, this debate has proceeded upon the theory that this is prohibition legislation, applicable to all mankind, whereas, Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to limit the power of the men who have been appointed, under the charter of a private corporation, to control, regulate, and care for the class of men known as "old soldiers," inmates of Soldiers' Homes. This legislation does not relate to any other class of men than to the "old soldier." It does not apply to all classes, but to a specific class, to a class, too, who are to be reformed, but who are given a home.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. By the formation of this Board or this corporation Congress has intrusted the care of these old soldiers to the President of the United States, to the Chief Justice, to the Secretary of War, and nine other members of that Board, selected from among those who were the comrades of the men for whose care they are responsible.

We are not legislating, therefore, on the question of prohibition or upon the question of temperance. You propose by this amendment to take away from this Board the power of doing that which has been deemed necessary in the judgment of its members, including the highest officials of the Government, men who have voluntarily and gratuitously accepted the trust of providing for the comfort and well-being of these old soldiers. If it was wise to abolish the canteen in these Homes, don't you suppose this Board, composed of the men it is, would have done so long ago? Is it possible that such men as constitute this Board would permit the doing of that in these Homes which was harmful to their old comrades? It seems preposterous that this House should, without knowledge of the facts, be influenced by a sentiment in favor of temperance to say to this Board, You are not capable to manage these Homes and we will prescribe such rules as we are told by such men as the alleged Doctor Crafts should be adopted.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I simply want to correct, with the gentleman's permission, the impression that nearly all the old soldiers in the Home indulge in intoxicating liquors.

Mr. TAWNEY. I said nothing that would create that impression.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Hear me, please. It was the impression that was created before the gentleman began. It developed in the hearings that 50 per cent are total abstainers and that a comparatively few drink to excess.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is unquestionably the fact, Mr. Chairman. Who is the better qualified to determine what will best promote the welfare of the old soldier in these Homes? Are we better qualified than the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and the Secretary of War, and the comrades of these old soldiers who constitute the Board of Managers to determine this question? Should we not be guided by their experience and their recommendations as to this? Every active member of the Board protests against this legislation. Their protests are based on their knowledge of the inmates of these Homes, their habits, and the influences they would be subjected to if they are left to the tender mercies of the saloon in the vicinity of the Home.

This Board has made the rule, they have adopted the regulation under which beer, having no more than 2 per cent of alcohol, is allowed to be sold. No man can obtain two drinks of beer in any of the canteens except at certain intervals. He must wait until his turn comes. Thus they obtain only the mildest of beers, and are free from any other associations except the men with whom they associated during the war.

Mr. LLOYD. Has the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, or the Secretary of War recommended this legislation?

Mr. TAWNEY. None of them have recommended this legislation, and I will say that no member of the Board has recommended it; on the contrary they protest against it.

Mr. LLOYD. Has anyone recommended the canteen?

Mr. TAWNEY. Only by adopting the regulation allowing the canteen they have thereby given it their approval, and have done it in the interest of the old soldier.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to throw a little light on the action of the mayor of Marion, Ind. There is in Indiana a law——

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I want to give some information.

Mr. TAWNEY. The old Soldiers' Home until 1880 was maintained by the fund known as the "forfeiture of pay," and a large amount of clothing turned over to these Homes after the close of the war. It was not until 1880 that the Government of the United States commenced to appropriate money for their maintenance. These Homes are the property of the corporation, not of the United States. They are the property of a corporation created by this act of Congress. I submit in closing, Mr. Chairman, that the men who fought by the side of the men who have been intrusted to their care are better qualified than are we to determine what is for their best interests and what is for their comfort and their well-being, and therefore I submit that the amendment ought to be defeated.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

Mr. TAWNEY. I object. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee by limitation has fixed the closing of debate.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I ask unamimous consent.

Mr. TAWNEY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The only question now before the committee is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, which the Clerk will again report.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 105, noes 58.

Mr. STAFFORD. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BOWERSOCK] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 109, noes 63.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

State or Territorial Homes for Disabled Soldiers and Sailors: For continuing aid to State or Territorial Homes for the support of disabled volunteer soldiers, in conformity with the act approved August 27, 1888, including all classes of soldiers admissible to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, $1,150,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home until its laws, rules, or regulations respecting the pensions of its inmates be made to conform to the provisions of section 4 of an act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act prescribing regulations for the Soldiers' Home located at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" but the above proviso shall not apply to any State or Territorial Home into which the wives or widows of soldiers are admitted and maintained: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home that maintains a bar or canteen where intoxicating liquors are sold.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, just before the last vote was taken I attempted to get some information before the House, but was prevented by the extreme courtesy of the chairman of the committee. What I wanted to say to the committee, and what I say now, is that I hold in my hand photographs of six saloons just outside of the gates of this Home at Marion, Ind. Permit me to say that this model mayor of Marion, Ind., where there is a State law that prohibits a saloon within a mile of the Soldiers' Home, allows this. Also I find the chief of police attached to the administration of this mayor is now on trial before the governor of the State of Indiana, at least charges are pending against him, because of the character of the administration that he allows in the city of Marion.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. Permit me to say that the mayor of the city of Marion is a model executive, and in no manner has any jurisdiction over the police force. We have in Indiana a metropolitan police law, which places the control of police matters in a board of police managers. It is simply a State law. I merely say that to exonerate my worthy constituent.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am very glad to that extent to get the correction, but that does not do away with the fact that there are six saloons under the immediate shadow of the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to know, Mr. Chairman, if this is a post-mortem or a motion for a rehearing of a question decided? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that it is neither.

Mr. REEDER. Postprandial.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is piling up evidence for next year. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. KEIFER. I renew it, and give notice that I will withdraw it later. I wanted to say before the vote was taken on the last amendment—but I do not complain that I was shut out—that we were then engaged in the consideration of an amendment to this bill that was in exact harmony with the paragraph of the bill which we have just read relating to State Soldiers' Homes. I did not quite understand why certain members of the Committee on Appropriations wanted us to be better in our Soldiers' Homes in the States than they were in the Soldiers' Homes that belong to and are under the control of the Federal Government. There should be no distinction. The same class of old soldiers are inmates of the State and National Homes.

I now call the attention of members of the committee to the exact language almost of the amendment we have just voted into the bill applicable to the various Soldiers' Homes that are conducted and managed under Federal law. The last clause of the last paragraph reads:

That no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home that maintains a bar or canteen where intoxicating liquors are sold.

This clause relates to Homes in States and Territories that are under the management and control of States. In these State Homes—I speak principally of the one in Ohio—we have soldiers of the civil war, old and indigent soldiers, disabled either by age or disease. I am happy to say that now there is little or no trouble on the subject of the canteen in these State Homes. I do not think you could force a canteen into the State Home in Ohio by any Federal law you could pass.

I want to make one other remark, and that is that there seems to be a general impression among the Members, and perhaps over the country, that in past years, in time of war, we had canteens where the soldiers could go and buy intoxicating liquors ad libitum. No such thing existed in the Union or the Confederate army during the civil war. There were no canteens or sutler's tents where the soldier could go and buy intoxicating liquors. No army in civilized times has been or could be maintained with a canteen of that kind. Sometimes the sutlers sold liquor to officers, but generally speaking that was prohibited. Occasionally in the war, both in the Union and Confederate armies, in bad weather, in times when soldiers were on specially hard police duty, there was issued by the authorities a ration of liquor, but there was no such thing as a canteen where soldiers could go and purchase it. An army where the soldiers had a right to purchase intoxicating liquors at canteens would be one without discipline.

Now, I have said enough on that subject. I could give some experience about the Spanish war, but I have not time now. There were in my command in Florida and Georgia and also in Cuba, in certain regiments, canteens where beer was sold under special regulations, but most of the regiments had no canteens, and it was my experience with a large number of regiments that those having such canteens had the most drunkenness and the most men who broke the guard lines and went on the outside to indulge in the use of intoxicants. It seemed to be true that the soldiers who were allowed a limited use of strong drink were the most likely to seek it where there was no limitation. Only a small per cent, comparatively, of our soldiers in any of our wars were addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors at all. The old and feeble soldiers now in National or State Homes care for it less than ever before, and they seek it less than in earlier life. The question may not be one of prohibition, but it is certainly one of temperance and of discipline.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to address the House not entirely germane to the pending paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on a subject not germane to the pending paragraph. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I noticed in one of last evening's newspapers a dispatch relating to a discussion in the House of Commons yesterday on the subject of American meat products, which called my attention not only to the far-reaching and disastrous effects of the present agitation relative to the conditions surrounding the slaughter and preparation of meats in American packing houses, but to such an unfortunate misconception of the facts, and of the nature and character of criticisms which have been made officially or unofficially of packing-house methods, which misconception, I fear, owing to highly colored, sensational, and exaggerated statements, is shared by a considerable number of our own people, that in my opinion it is highly important, in the interest of the good name of the American people as well as of the vast industries affected, that every reasonable effort be made to remind the country and our foreign customers of the facts with regard to our meat-slaughtering and packing industries.

It is important that the fact be emphasized that if all that has been charged in certain official and semiofficial reports were admitted, and it is not by any means, the charges therein made of unsatisfactory conditions relate to the preparation of an almost infinitesimal fraction of the products of a few packing houses, and when analyzed are found to allege conditions in the main affecting the workers in some departments of certain packing houses rather than the products themselves. They complain of conditions admittedly unsatisfactory if they exist, but mostly in the domain of the sociologist rather than in the sphere of the seeker after the truth relative to the healthfulness of food products. The trusted, efficient, scientific inspectors of the Agricultural Department, accustomed to the conditions that must necessarily surround the slaughter of animals, failed to find, we understand, ground for serious criticism as to the healthfulness or cleanliness of the processes employed in the preparation of meats in the great packing houses, but they were followed by well-meaning gentlemen no doubt, but gentlemen whose business, whose profession in life it is to search out things to criticise in order that they may employ themselves in the endeavor to reform them, and they did find some conditions no doubt in some packing houses not as they ought to be, not so much affecting the healthfulness and cleanliness of the meats as affecting the health and, as they say, the morals of employees.

These reports and criticisms scattered broadcast, highly colored and exaggerated as they were passed along, have resulted in incalculable injury, not only to the packing business, but to the live-stock industry of the country generally.

I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, but what gentlemen so sensitive that their optics and olfactories are offended because a place where animals are slaughtered is not in all of its departments as fragrant as an establishment for the bottling of eau de cologne, and who would probably shrink from the preparation of an omelet because it involves the somewhat mussy performance of breaking and beating eggs, would find quite as much to criticise were they sent out to inspect the kitchens of the best people of the land. There are some processes in the preparation of some kinds of food that are not appealing either to the eye or to the nostrils. I know of no way in which these processes can be rendered altogether satisfactory to sensitive and finicky people.

It was a bad day for Chicago and the packing and stock-growing industries of the United States when that now historic porker slipped his trolley and fell—just where he fell is controverted—whether he actually did soil his jowl is questionable; whether the dust he might have accumulated was entirely removed by antiseptic and disinfectant preparations is still shrouded in mystery. The fact that he was only one of a million of his brethren, of whose cleanliness there could be no question, is forgotten. The further fact that he in all human probability was thoroughly cleansed, if as a matter of fact he was ever seriously soiled, is entirely overlooked, and he goes down in history entirely eclipsing that other famous Chicago animal, Mrs. O'Leary's cow, in the awful loss and havoc he has wrought.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the demand for time——

Mr. MONDELL. I have not taken any of the time of the House during this debate. I think I can conclude in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, that famous Chicago hog was only half a hog and not a whole one.

Mr. MONDELL. Then there is only half as much in the criticism that has been made of it, ridiculous as it is, as I supposed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman dispute the statement contained in the President's message; and if so, upon what does he base his denial?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only three minutes, and I can not in that time go into that question. I am giving my opinion, and the gentleman can judge for himself.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is disputed by none that nowhere on earth are large numbers of animals slaughtered and prepared for human food under conditions so absolutely insuring the healthfulness, the cleanliness, and the palatableness of the product as in the packing establishments of our country under Federal supervision. No question has ever been raised, even by the most confirmed and captious fault-finder, of the healthfulness and cleanliness of the vast bulk of our meat products, and particularly that portion which enters into foreign trade.

Mr. Chairman, I consider it most unfortunate for the great packing and live-stock industries, for the peace of mind of our people, for our good name abroad, that it should have been deemed necessary, in order to call attention to the somewhat careless handling in some packing houses of certain meat products, constituting an infinitesimal proportion of the entire product, and certain insanitary conditions affecting some workers in the meat-packing industries, with a view of securing or recommending an extension of Federal inspection, to place before the country in a manner calculated to magnify their contents, certain reports which themselves bear on their face the stamp of hypercritical criticism, if not, indeed, visionary bias.

Now that the matter is up to Congress, I have every confidence that it will be treated by the Committee on Agriculture, which is now considering it, and by this House with that calm, dispassionate judgment which the great importance of the matter warrants and demands. It pertains to and vitally affects vast industries. If the packing industries of the country were alone affected, their rights should demand our attention; but the great live-stock industries of the country are equally affected. They have already suffered and will suffer losses amounting to many millions by this agitation. There must be an extension of Federal inspection, more for the restoration of public confidence than because of any real necessity for it, providing local sanitary laws are enforced; but in providing for this extension of inspection its cost should be paid by the Government rather than laid upon the packers, who would unload it on the stock raisers.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; although my time is limited.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Who pays for the inspection of the banks? Who pays for the inspection of oleomargarine? Who pays for the inspection of butter? Who pays for the inspection of the insurance companies——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech in the minute and a half I have remaining. The gentleman probably knows who pays for these inspections.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes, I do know; and I know who makes them, too.

Mr. MONDELL. But if the country demands a sanitary inspection of any industry the country should pay for it, and it should not be loaded upon a single industry, particularly an industry that can unload the burden upon the stock raisers of the country, who are in no way responsible for the hue and cry, the hysterical agitation that has been raised in regard to this matter.

In passing on the question of inspection the House should neither be disturbed nor affected in its judgment by thoughtless clamor for legislation beyond the power of Congress to enact or so drastic and complicated that it would in the end defeat the very purpose for which it is enacted.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask of the House the same consideration which was shown to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. I ask the indulgence of the House for eight minutes while I discuss the question not pertinent to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for eight minutes upon a subject not germane to the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Texas may defer his remarks until we get further along. In a few minutes more we will complete the reading of the bill up to the Department of Justice, where we agreed this morning to return to those paragraphs passed over a few days ago, the registers and receivers of the Land Office and the Geological Survey. I do not want to give up all the time of the committee and I do not think it is fair to ask the committee to consent to it. I think the gentleman can well defer his remarks now and go on to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota object?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota objects.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman is not willing to concede to me the same courtesy which was shown to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the feeling on the part of the gentleman from Texas that I am discriminating in favor of a Member on this side of the Chamber, I will say that we have just concluded the reading of the bill relating to Soldiers' Homes, and at this point we will stop until to-morrow morning, and when the House goes into Committee of the Whole we will begin on the item reserved in respect to the registers and receivers. I will consent that the gentleman from Texas may have eight minutes this evening, because the gentleman from Massachusetts wants some time on the same subject of meat inspection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, reserving the right to object, that I do not care what is done this evening, but I announce to the House that I am not willing for the House to get into a debate on some extraneous subject until after the pure-food bill is considered.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not want to object to anything that may take place to-night, but I do not want anybody to get up to-morrow and claim time on the ground of what has taken place this afternoon.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest that if we get into a discussion of the meat question now it will follow the course of this bill, and we will not finish it for a week.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, as every Member of this House knows, the country has been seriously disturbed for several days past, and a great business interest has been upset and hurt by the report made by a special committee sent out, I believe, by the President, to report on the condition of the slaughterhouses in the city of Chicago. That report was sensational in its character and has commanded the attention of the universe. That it has been hurtful to values no man familiar with markets and those things which influence markets can for a moment deny. Whatever harm can be done by that report, however, has been done, and I trust, sir, we shall soon have a compensating amount of good come out of it.

I shall not undertake to inquire whether this reform might not have been brought about in a different manner, but the thought will intrude itself upon my mind that if there had been less beating of drums and less blare of trumpets, less yellow-journal methods in the preparation and publication of the report, the reform might have been equally as effective, less appalling to honest wealth, less disturbing to the business interests of the country, and with much less loss to the cattle growers. [Applause.]

I am not saying a word in defense of the packers. Whatever offense there is in this matter has come from them, and if all that is charged against them be true, laws should be found, or if they do not exist, laws should be made that will compel them to do justice by the consumers of this country. The people of the country pay good round prices for meat, and they are entitled to be get clean, wholesome food. My sympathy goes out in another direction, Mr. Chairman. There is another class of people that I am concerned for and greatly interested in. The packers can take care of themselves. Even if they have lost millions, when this agitation is over they will have millions remaining, and most of it sweated from the brows of the cattle owners, the ranchmen of this country, and the farmers. I say again the packers are not in any particular need of our sympathy.

The newspapers have brought us information of a steady decline in the value of cattle. Day after day my mail is overflowing with appeals from the cattle growers of my district, asking me to use what little influence I may have in inducing Congress to take speedy action. Why, sir, since the beginning of this speech, or to be more accurate, while the gentleman from Wyoming was talking, I am in receipt of a telegram signed by two dozen or more of the prominent citizens of one county in my district protesting vigorously against a continuance of the present intolerable conditions. Unless we are to have speedy relief a useful, honorable, and innocent class of people—the cattle growers—will suffer losses from which they can only recover after years of uninterrupted prosperity.

The situation is disastrous for the people of the Southwest. Bankers and merchants who have advanced money upon cattle, apprehending that there will be a continued decline in the value of the commodity on which their money has been loaned, are pressing these cattlemen to put their supplies on the market, thus forcing the ranchman to compete with his own distress. To a market already depressed by this report we are to have added and superadded the depression which comes from a tremendous shipment of cattle, forced out by the call of these bankers and merchants for a prompt cancellation of their loans.

Mr. Chairman, as to the report, very sensational and serious things are charged in it, which the packers deny. Whether they be true or not is a matter that should be determined as quickly as possible, and I hope before it adjourns that this Congress will send a committee specially instructed to ascertain and report what are the facts in the case. The serious things that are charged by Neill and Reynolds have been largely denied by the packers. We must know, sir, in the interest of this great industry, whether these things are true or not. The paper this afternoon has a telegram from Chicago saying that twenty-nine governments have ordered their consuls to immediately undertake the investigation of conditions in the stock yards in Chicago, and any refusal of the beef trust to give the foreign government agents the information they seek will result in a report to their governments that "the beef trust has failed to disprove the charges," which will mean the barring of the Chicago stock yards' products from that country. Mr. Chairman, if it did not bar the ranch products of Texas, Wyoming, of Montana and Colorado, and of all the farms and ranches in the country, I would feel less concerned about it. But they are the people who after all will have to pay the shot in this instance. Something must be done and done promptly to restore the confidence of the consumers of meat or we will have a panic precipitated which will carry disaster into every avenue of business.

It has been suggested, Mr. Chairman, that the expense of any inspection that may be established shall be borne by a per capita charge on the cattle that are to be slaughtered. I want to protest in the name of the people whom I represent against what I conceive to be a gross injustice. [Applause.] And in this connection I want to submit to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that the instances he has referred to should not be taken as a precedent. Less than five years ago this body, largely at his instance, passed a bit of legislation which in my judgment was the most unfair, the most selfish, the most sectional I have ever known. Congress levied a tax upon the cattle producers of the country in the interest of butter makers in a comparatively few States, and now to that injustice, which depreciated the value of the products of the ranches and farms, we are to have added the further obligation of compelling that particular industry to pay officers of the Government for the discharge of governmental functions.

If we are to have Federal inspection it will be by officers of the General Government, and the expense of the system ought to be paid by all the people. The packers have been charged with a great many misdeeds, but no one has yet seen fit to charge them with being fools. They knew how to handle their business in their own interest, and it can not be doubted for a moment that they will shift the burden of supporting the inspection on to the cattle growers. But such a charge should not be put on either the butchers or the people who sell the cattle. The inspectors will be public officers, and the charge for their support should be borne by the people whose officers they are. Some gentlemen say, "I believe the Secretary of Agriculture himself has indulged in this foolish talk—that if we do not support the system of inspection by a per capita tax on the cattle offered for slaughter the whole scheme will fail." Has it come to this that because we fear that some future Congress may fail to do its duty a special burden is to be put on the people who raise cattle? It would be an outrage which I refuse to believe can be seriously thought of.

I do not know how far we can go, under the restraints of the Constitution, in establishing this scheme of inspection. But I do know that something must be done, and quickly. Somewhere, either in the Federal Government or in that of the States or cities where this slaughtering is done, a power certainly exists which can protect the people against the indecencies complained of. And that is the remedy. We want that power invoked and the remedy applied at once. Every day that we let this thing drag is an unpardonable crime against the honest men who have heretofore been victims of the greed of the packers and are now to be made to pay a tax to control their crimes, if certain gentlemen are to have their way. It is time to put away this hysteria and to treat this unfortunate situation in a sane and rational way.

Legislation inspired by a novel and promoted by an essay on slaughterhouse filth is not apt to be either sane or rational, however much it may harmonize with the methods of an Administration which is, by choice, explosive and dramatic, rather than calm and fair.

I send to the Clerk's desk for insertion in the RECORD a few sample telegrams and letters which I have received, all asking for speedy action by Congress.

COMMERCIAL BANK OF BRADY,
Brady, Tex., June 8, 1906.

Hon. JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find a petition from our citizens which is self-explanatory and voices the sentiment of the entire community. We also think that cost of inspection should be borne by the Government, and not saddled on the producer. We could get practically every man's signature in this country to this petition, but think these are sufficient to show how we feel. Thanking you for anything that you can do for us,

Yours, very truly, G. R. WHITE.

Hon. JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I fear that the investigation now going on will be very damaging to our beef industry. I hope you will use your influence to have the Secretary to announce as soon as possible that our inspection of beef is thorough in all the markets.

Thanking you for your many favors, and when I can be of service to you command me,

Yours, truly, R. R. RUSSELL, Cattleman.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the same consideration of eight minutes which has been granted to the two gentlemen who have preceded me, for the purpose of addressing the committee on a subject also not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for eight minutes on a subject not germane to the pending paragraph. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, if the Emperor of Germany should issue a ukase to the effect that, after careful investigation, he had found that all the beet sugar of Germany has been and was being manufactured under atrociously insanitary conditions, what do you imagine would be the effect on the rest of the world, and what in particular do you suppose would be the effect on the German beet-sugar industry itself? We are now face to face with an entirely analogous situation in this country in respect to the slaughtering and packing industries, caused by the publication, by the Executive, of the Neill-Reynolds report and the supplementary report of the Department of Agriculture.

The great export trade in meat and meat products is not only paralyzed, as if by a lightning stroke, but also are we ourselves aghast at the magnitude and enormity of the outrages perpetrated in an arrogance of power that seems in the light of the present publicity to be nothing short of madness.

I have no sympathy whatever for the packers who deliberately brought this storm of righteous indignation against their methods and upon themselves; but I have the greatest sympathy for the Executive, who, to rectify a crying evil, was forced, much against his desires and earnest appeal, to make public the report that he well knew would reap a whirlwind of horror and reproach for one of our greatest industries.

Had the packers believed or had they been willing or anxious to prove the charges forever untrue they would have welcomed—yes, aided—in the immediate adoption of the Beveridge bill. That bill passed the Senate without a dissenting voice. It meets with the approval of our Executive and of the people. It is now before the House in committee, and the packers, in the arrogance of their boasted strength, are now boldly and openly endeavoring to emasculate its most essential provisions.

The bill represents carefully considered and incessant labor of some three months by a leading member of the Senate, of collaboration with the Department of Agriculture, and at least a dozen revisions, with the sole end in view of securing to us and our families the same care and sanitation required in the preparation of food for foreigners and aliens. They also cry out that the bill was unconstitutional. With all due respect to my friend the Judge from Indiana, the bill is as constitutional as an appropriation bill for maintenance and support of either the Army or the Navy. If he has any real doubt about it, I would refer him to lines 3 and 4 of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution. To-day no one questions the constitutionality of the Federal law that denies the farmer the right to sell or the transportation of his milk, if it does not contain the requisite amount of butter fat. Then can one question our authority to provide that a farmer shall not sell or cause to be transported cattle or meat that has too large a percentage of tuberculosis or other germs?

In order to marshal some show of decency about their demands, in a vain effort to cover their everlasting disgrace and shame, they then seek to hide behind the cloak of disagreement between the House and the Senate; and in order to confound the President, and to discredit his investigations and report, by the apparent refusal of Congress to act thereon, they send word to all the farmers and cattle raisers, to the agricultural interests, that if they, too, would not suffer they must rally to the cause.

And the Committee on Agriculture, in answer to these hysterical demands, is attempting to modify and emasculate the Beveridge bill by providing that the Government shall pay the cost of inspection.

Not content with the shameless acquisition of countless fortunes from tainted sources, safe in their belief of their own immunity, arrogant in their escape from the processes of our courts, violators of our laws against illegal combinations, spreaders of the white plague, slaughterers of humanity—in order to save a paltry two millions—by threats of lowering the price of cattle they would drive their very victims to their own defense and risk, yes, bring ruin to every cattle raiser in the land. To provide that the Government should pay the cost of inspection would be to completely nullify the purpose of the bill. I say this advisedly, and in the belief that I can prove it to every unprejudiced person.

First, let me answer the assumption that the cost will not fall on the packers, but on the raisers.

To begin with, do you suppose for a minute that these philanthropic combiners would risk the delay, the agitation, and consequent loss in their own business affairs in order to save a few pennies to the producers?

Their able and surprisingly frank representative before the Agricultural Committee, Mr. Wilson, admitted that the cost would fall entirely upon the packers, and not upon the farmers.

And this becomes apparent the moment you consider that the packers can not, with any face, demand of the producer a reduction in the price of cattle because of the added cost of inspection to them; when the cost of such inspection to-day is but 3 cents a head, the estimated cost will be 5 cents a head, and 8 cents a head would be an outside figure, providing every convenience and care. Now, an animal will weigh some 1,200 pounds, and there is no practical way by which 8 cents can be distributed over 1,200 pounds in the purchase of an animal by weight.

But for the sake of the argument let us suppose that the meat trusts are risking their all to secure 8 cents a head to the poor farmer, and that the producer will lose in the end 8 cents per head. My contention is that to change the Senate amendment, with the purpose of relieving the packers of a pro rata cost of inspection and place that cost on the Government, will be but to emasculate the bill.

In this connection it would be well to call your attention to the well-proven strength of these immense interests in the halls of Congress, as evidenced by the present inspection law, and to the now most-evident fact of its utter and absolute inefficiency and insufficiency. Yet their proposition is to make a slight increase in the amount of money available for inspection as a cure-all for the evils and outrages perpetrated against humanity. The estimated annual cost at present of an adequate inspection will be about $1,800,000. We have appropriated for this purpose nearly $700,000. The proposition of the packers is that we should appropriate—in the very pressure of our indignation—some $2,000,000.

Assume, what may or may not be true, that this sum will provide inspection of all meat and meat products for the coming year. By next year the business will have grown and the sum would be insufficient—the following year still more insufficient. Now, while there is the greatest agitation on the subject they propose that we appropriate what from a conservative estimate would be absolutely necessary. Next year this agitation will have passed, the cost of inspection will be greater, and all the beef trust will have to do to secure an inspection of only such meat as it seems wise will be to block the appropriation.

There can be no one, within the sound of my voice, who does not appreciate that an adequate appropriation is the hardest of all things to secure; and how easy, in the interest of the beef trust, it would be possible to enlist the voice of the demagogue, the hue of the whole minority party, the cry of the interested around the banner of economy.

It was only a few days ago when one single isolated iconoclast, in the face of the apparent wishes of not only the whole of the Republican majority, but also the opposition to the voice and desires of his own party, stopped the appropriation for such a worthy and necessary object as the payment of the traveling expenses of the President of the United States.

Then, how easy to render absortive a proper inspection and regulation of an interest so vital to us all, if we leave the cost of inspection to the insufficient appropriation, from which we are now suffering and have been suffering in the past.

There is still another most important phase to this proposition. Under whip of public opinion, the larger packers would probably be held up to a fairly high standard; but what are we going to do with the thousand and one small operators that multiply with the increase of our population, and for which no sum that Congress would be willing to appropriate could or would provide inspectors.

No one will doubt that hereafter a slaughter or a packing house that can not furnish with its products a governmental clean bill of health will have to go out of business. I, for one, will not vote for a measure that would so strengthen the hold of the beef trust.

If the trusts alone are inspected and vigorously held to proper standards, then the diseased and noxious cattle and hogs will quickly find their way alive to the uninspected abattoirs. It would seem necessary, therefore, that all slaughter and packing houses be rigidly inspected.

If the cost of inspection be charged pro rata, then the cost of inspection in the large plants would not actually cost as much as the charge pro rated, while in the smaller plants the actual cost would be much larger than the pro rated cost. This, to me, would seem to be the only expedient way. I see in yesterday's morning papers that the President is claimed by the representatives of the packers to have given his tacit consent to proposed changes in the Beveridge bill, relieving the packers of the cost of inspection. This I have found to be unqualifiedly denied. We are agreed that a great wrong has been perpetrated upon humanity; that a great hardship has, rightly or wrongly, been placed on large and varied industrial and agricultural interests; we are agreed that all meats should be properly inspected, and that the wrong done and damage caused can be remedied none too quickly. Then cease trying to emasculate the Beveridge bill, and in the justice of right and equity and power, in the interest of the struggling, toiling humanity, of men overweak from incessant labor, of the women and children of to-day, and in the memory of the countless throng that passed away of a yesterday, in the clutch of the great white plague, insist upon a complete and rigidly enforced inspection by making the packers pay the cost thereof.

Mr. FULKERSON rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. Does the gentleman from Missouri wish——

Mr. FULKERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to take exception to the closing paragraph of the statement of the gentlemen from Massachusetts, to the effect that the present examination of meat products by the Government is insufficient. I want to deny that statement in toto in so far as the packing houses at St. Joseph, Mo., are concerned. At our stock yards Government ante-mortem inspection and in all our packing houses Government post-mortem inspection is strict, adequate, complete, and most effective. Inspection has thus been carried on there for years, and no complaint has ever been made against our meat products of any kind. I was reared on the farm, and I have there officiated at many hog-killings myself. I have many times gone through and carefully examined our packing plants and closely inspected their methods of slaughter and manner of handling meats and meat products, and I want to say that so far as the cleanliness, healthfulness, and wholesomeness of the products—the food products—of the St. Joseph packing houses is concerned, they are par excellent, and can not be surpassed either on the farm or in any other packing plants in the world. Our packing houses are some of them brand new, and all of them comparatively new. They are modern in every particular, and no pains or expense has been spared in their construction, equipment, and maintenance. No complaint should be made against our plants, the employees, the methods, or the products on the ground that they are insanitary or unwholesome, for such is not the case. Government inspectors are on the ground all the time to inspect the animals as they arrive in the yards. Animals diseased or unfit for human food are there weeded out and not allowed to even enter the packing houses. Later each carcass must undergo the strictest post-mortem inspection, and such carcasses as are condemned by the Government inspectors are sent to tanks to be converted into fertilizer. And this is done under the eye and orders of competent inspectors sent there by this Government.

The fact that the packing houses of one city have been accused of careless or unclean methods in the handling of meat products, or the fact that some of the buildings of that city are alleged to be unsanitary, should not be allowed to bring all the other packing houses of the country—and there are hundreds of others—under the condemnation that is being heaped upon the supposed guilty.

It is against that theory that I here and now protest. Merit to whom merit is due. I do not defend the guilty, if any there be, but I seek to protect the innocent. I am a great meat eater myself, and hence I am interested in knowing that the meat that comes to my table is clean and wholesome. To satisfy myself on this point I have time and again visited these packing plants at St. Joseph and examined them critically, and I know as well as I know anything that their food products, in the can or out of the can, the beef, pork, mutton, and every food product manufactured there is clean, healthful, and wholesome in all respects.

Now, this great outcry against packing houses in general is unjust and unwarranted by the facts. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 13, 1906.

Prayer by Rev. CHARLES CUTHBERT HALL, D. D., of the city of New York.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SCOTT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

ISSUE OF NOTES OF SMALL DENOMINATIONS.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I submit a memorial from the bankers' associations of Georgia and Florida, in joint session at Atlanta. Before I move its reference I desire to say a word. I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the memorial.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., June 11, 1906.

To the UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas there is great necessity for prompt and immediate legislation authorizing a much larger issue of one, two, and five dollar bills than is now in circulation: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the joint session of the Georgia and Florida bankers' associations, That the Senate is hereby earnestly memorialized to pass during its present session House bill No. 13566.

L. P. HILLYER,
Secretary Georgia Bankers' Association.
GEO. R. DESSONSSURE,
Secretary Florida Bankers' Association.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Georgia submitting remarks on the memorial? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will occupy a very few minutes.

I desire to state that the memorial grows out of an application which I recently made to the Treasury Department for the furnishing of small bank bills to banks in Southern States. In response to my application to the Treasury Department, I was informed that under the present law it is impossible for the Department to furnish to the country the needed amount of bills in small denominations, the reason being that under the law gold certificates can only be issued in denominations of not less than $20, and national banks are restricted in their issue of bills of the denomination of $5 to one-third of the amount of their issue.

The Department called my attention to the fact that a bill was then pending in the House which removed both the restrictions, which would allow gold certificates to be issued in denominations of ten and five dollars and removing the restriction upon banks in regard to the proportion of five-dollar bills which they were allowed to issue.

The statement was made to me in the Treasury Department that this bill should be passed by Congress—it has since passed the House—and that if it should become a law, by its passage in the Senate and its approval by the President, the supply of notes of ten and five dollars denomination in gold certificates and in national-bank notes would be such that the Department could then cancel the silver certificates of five-dollar denomination and issue one and two dollar silver certificates in their place.

The important fact, Mr. President, which justifies me in calling the attention of the Senate especially to the matter at this time is the statement that even heretofore the need of the country for bills of this denomination during the harvest season has been insufficient; that in the growing and developing business of the country it is found to be quite insufficient at this season of the year, and that unless this relief is given by Congress at this time there will be very great embarrassment during the coming fall when the crops are being moved.

In response to my request, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Keep, with whom I had the conversation, put what he then had to say in writing, and I ask that the letter which he has written to me on this subject may now be read. I see some members of the Finance Committee present, and I desire to ask their special attention to the letter. I hope that it may be found consistent with their view of the interests of the country to give early consideration to this matter and bring it to the attention of the Senate. The passage of the bill by the House is referred to in the letter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 4, 1906.

MY DEAR SIR: I return you herewith the letter of Mr. L. P. Hillyer, secretary of the Georgia Bankers' Association, and the letter of Mr. Parsons, assistant cashier of the Chemical National Bank of New York, both relating to a scarcity of small bills.

The inability of the Treasury Department to supply the number of small bills needed for the business of the country is most embarrassing at the present time. This is a season of the year when ordinarily we are able to meet all demands for small notes, and in view of our inability to do so now we have reason to anticipate greater difficulties in the fall, when the movement of the crops always increases the demand for small notes.

For six years past the Treasury has been operating under the provisions of the act of March 14, 1900, and during this period the volume of notes of the denomination of $10 and under has been increased by nearly $190,000,000, through a process of redeeming and canceling notes of larger denominations and issuing in their stead smaller ones. In making changes of this character under existing laws, the limit was practically reached at the close of the last fiscal year, and the attention of Congress was invited to this condition in the annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Treasurer of the United States. On the 1st of the present month the outstanding notes of the denomination of $20 and over which, when presented for redemption, could be reissued in small denominations was as follows:

United States notes	$62,000,000
Treasury notes of 1890	2,000,000
Silver certificates	14,000,000
Total	78,000,000

These notes come in very slowly, doubtless because they are held in bank reserves and in packages of currency which have remained in bank vaults for a number of years without disturbance.

Under existing law gold certificates can not be issued under the denomination of $20, and, except for the very small amount of free silver dollars in the Treasury, which are being used gradually for the issue of silver certificates of the denominations of one, two, and five dollars, to meet the daily demands of the subtreasury offices and afford some relief to the needs of business, the Treasury is limited, in its daily issue of small notes, to the unfit currency of small denominations which comes in for exchange into new bills. Any bank, sending direct to the Department at Washington notes of small denominations, can obtain new notes of the same kind and denominations as those sent in. This can not always be done at the subtreasuries, as those officers are quite unable to meet the demands made upon them for small notes, and can only pay out new silver certificates to the extent the Department at Washington is able to supply them.

A bill has passed the House of Representatives, and is now pending in the Senate, to permit the issue of gold certificates of the denominations of five and ten dollars, and to remove the present restriction which limits each national bank in the issue of five-dollar national bank notes to one-third of its outstanding circulation. The passage of this bill would enable a considerable quantity of the outstanding five-dollar silver certificates to be converted into ones and twos, and their places to be supplied with gold certificates and national-bank notes.

Should this bill not become a law at the present session, inconvenience will result, but the national banks themselves can relieve the situation to some extent by issuing as large a proportion of their circulation in five-dollar denomination as the existing statute permits. This would so greatly increase the number of five-dollar national-bank notes as to permit the conversion of not less than $50,000,000 of five-dollar silver certificates into ones and twos.

The free shipment of standard silver dollars from the Treasury to banks applying for the same would not remedy the situation in any degree. A particular bank which is able to circulate silver dollars in this locality might thus have its needs supplied, but every silver dollar shipped from the Treasury reduces the number of silver certificates which the Treasury can issue.

Respectfully, yours

C. H. KEEP,
Assistant Secretary.

Hon. A. O. BACON,
United States Senate.

Mr. BACON. I move that the memorial and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did I understand the Senator to say that it is a roll of the soldiers of the civil war recently made up?

Mr. TELLER. No; it contains several different papers, but it is in connection with the bill to establish that roll.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh! Exactly.

Mr. TELLER. There is nothing objectionable in it. It was handed to me by a very distinguished officer of the United States Army.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Mr. FLINT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6443) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Cal., certain public lands in California; and granting rights in, over, and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timber Land Reserve, Cal., to the city of Los Angeles, Cal., to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, to add at the end of the bill the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That in the event that the Secretary of the Interior shall abandon the project known as the "Owens River project," for the irrigation of lands in Inyo County, Cal., under the act of June 17, 1902, the city of Los Angeles, in said State, is to pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the account of the reclamation fund established by said act, the amount expended for preliminary surveys, examinations, and river measurements, not exceeding $14,000, and in consideration of said payment the said city of Los Angeles is to have the benefit of the use of the maps and field notes resulting from said surveys, examinations, and river measurements and the preference right to acquire at any time within three years from the approval of this act all lands now reserved by the United States under the terms of said act for reservoir or dam sites in connection with said project, upon filing with the register and receiver of the land office in the land district where said reservoir or dam sites are situated a map showing the lands desired to be acquired and upon the payment of $1.25 per acre to the receiver of said land office title to said land so reserved and filed on shall vest in said city of Los Angeles, and such title shall be and remain in said city only for the purposes aforesaid and shall revert to the United States in the event of the abandonment thereof for the purposes aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANN THOMPSON.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4899) granting an increase of pension to Ann Thompson, to report it favorably with an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a bill which was misplaced, and I ask that it be now considered. It was introduced long ago.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ann Thompson, widow of Samuel Thompson, late of Captains Evans and Aiken's companies, New Hampshire Militia, war of 1812, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM C. LONG.

Mr. McCUMBER. From the Committee on Pensions I report back without amendment the bill (S. 6301) granting an increase of pension to William C. Long.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William C. Long, late of Company I, Seventeenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals is directed to inquire, with all reasonable diligence, and to report by bill or otherwise—

First. Whether it is necessary and is consistent with public policy and proper economy that the business and property of the Panama Railroad should continue to be held or conducted under and in accordance with the charter of the Panama Railroad Company enacted by the legislature of the State of New York, and should remain under the legislative or other control of that State; or whether the control of said railroad and of all property held or controlled in its name, or in connection with it, should be placed under the jurisdiction and control and in the possession of the Isthmian Canal Commission, or other lawful authority in the Panama Canal Zone subject to the authority of Congress.

Second. Whether the Government of the United States should assume the outstanding debts and obligations of the Panama Railroad Company, and what provision should be made for their liquidation or payment.

Third. Whether the Government of the United States has any and what right to stock in the New Panama Canal Company that was issued to the Government of Colombia to the amount of 5,000,000 francs, or to any dividends or payments due on such stock from any funds in the treasury of said canal company.

Fourth. Whether the persons claiming to be members of the board of directors of the Panama Railroad Company hold such places as directors by any lawful tenure or authority; and if they are not so entitled, whether their appointment as such directors should be sanctioned by the approval of Congress.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. ELKINS, Mr. HOPKINS, and Mr. CLAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

Mr. KNOX. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 14396.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the bill is in order, and the Chair lays it before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was, on page 2, section 1, line 2, after the word "seal," to strike out "receive and acquire, by purchase or otherwise, real and personal property and rights of property, and may hold, use, lease, sell, mortgage, encumber, charge, pledge, grant, assign, and convey the same, and generally have and exercise all the powers usually granted to and vested in corporations of the United States of America, and especially full powers to carry out the purposes of this act" and to insert:

And the said corporation shall have and possess full power and authority to construct, equip, maintain, and operate the canals with appurtenances hereinafter described, and with power to take, receive, acquire, purchase, hold, use, lease, sell, mortgage, encumber, charge, pledge, grant, assign, and convey all such real and personal property and rights of property as may be requisite and needed in and about the construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of said canals or anything appertaining thereto. Said corporation is hereby vested with full and complete power to pledge, encumber, and mortgage any or all of its property and franchises for the purpose of raising, obtaining, and securing such funds or moneys as may be needed for the construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of said canals or anything appertaining thereto. Said corporation is also vested with all such further and additional powers as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Is that the first amendment, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the first amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, just for a moment; by the courtesy of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that the last three lines of this amendment seem to me to be entirely too broad.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I hope we may have order. We can not hear what the Senator from Texas is saying on this side of the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will suspend until the Senate is in order. [A pause.] The Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was suggesting to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who has this bill in charge, that the last three lines of the committee amendment on page 2, lines 23, 24, and 25, it seems to me, ought to be stricken out, because the objects of the corporation and the purposes for which the corporation is to be created are fully stated in the bill. Then to declare generally that, in addition to the specific purposes for which it is created, it "is also vested with all such further and additional powers as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act" is entirely too broad and liberal a provision to be inserted in an act for the creation of a corporation of this character. I simply call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to it, to see if he does not agree with that suggestion, and to see if it can not be remedied to that extent without debate.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], I will take this opportunity of saying that, while I called this bill up, I am not in charge of the bill in the sense that I have any control over it. I am not a member of the committee which reported the bill. The bill was reported by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who, on account of engagements, asked me to call it up and present it to the Senate. Therefore I am in no position authoritatively to commit the committee, but I have no objection whatever to answering the question, so far as I am personally concerned.

While the provision to which the Senator from Texas refers is not unusual and must be construed in the light of specific provisions contained in the bill, personally I see no objection to striking it out, because I do not think it either expands or limits—certainly it does not limit or expand the power that is being specifically conferred.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I was interrupted by the conversation around me and did not catch the suggestion or criticism made by the Senator from Texas, and I should be glad to have him state it again.

Mr. CULBERSON. The suggestion, Mr. President, was simply that the specific purposes for which the corporation is to be created are fully stated in the bill, and that I see no reason to complicate the matter by adding a general declaration that the corporation shall have all other powers necessary to carry out the purposes of the corporation, because, in my judgment, differing from the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], I believe the effect would be to enlarge rather than limit the purposes of the corporation to those expressly given.

Mr. NELSON. What are the particular words in the bill to which the Senator objects?

Mr. CULBERSON. The last sentence at the bottom of page 2.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not think those words are material. They do not enlarge the scope of the bill; and as the Senator objects to them, I shall make no objection to striking those words out, for I do not think that would militate against the main object of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment on page 2, section 1, line 23, after the word "thereto," by striking out:

> Said corporation is also vested with all such further and additional powers as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment as amended will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I hope that will not be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the question will be on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, yesterday I hastily made some objections to this bill. I had not then read it; but since then I have read it, and I find that the committee which has had the bill in charge has endeavored to remove some of the objections that certainly existed against it as it came from the other House.

I object to the bill, Mr. President, on general principles. I do not believe that there is any necessity in this case why the Government of the United States should attempt to give a charter to this canal company. I am not going to deny that there can be a case suggested in which the General Government might issue such a charter. It is possible for the Government to do so for certain purposes, but there is no necessity for it in this case.

I suppose this bill will become a law, and I do not know but the bill is as well guarded as it is possible to guard a bill of this character. I understand that section 9 is to be amended, or was amended, perhaps, yesterday before my attention was called to it and I raised an objection to it.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator from Colorado, if he will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. That at the proper time I shall move an amendment to meet the objection which was raised by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to section 9.

Mr. TELLER. It would perhaps be a good deal easier to determine what my objection to this bill is if I knew what the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Minnesota would be. Will the Senator offer his amendment now?

Mr. NELSON. I will do so as soon as we reach that point. It would be a little out of order now. I will state, however, that my amendment will be, when we reach that section, after the word "regulate," in line 13, on page 6, to insert the words "as to interstate and foreign commerce;" so that it will read:

> Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate, as to interstate and foreign commerce, the tolls, fares, and rates to be charged by said company for the use of said canals.

That limits it distinctly to interstate and foreign commerce. I propose to amend, also, after the word "all," in line 15, by inserting the words "interstate and foreign;" so as to read:

> And the said company and the said canals and all interstate and foreign transportation thereon shall be subject to all the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," etc.

That limits that paragraph strictly to interstate and foreign commerce, and leaves the States with full power to regulate as to local traffic.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that removes one objection which I had to the bill. When I came into the Senate Chamber yesterday afternoon the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] was just closing his remarks on the bill, and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] was asking him some questions. I repeat, the amendment suggested by the Senator from Minnesota removes that objection.

I should like to ask the Senator who has the bill more particularly in his charge, and who is informed as to the character of changes from the House bill, whether under this bill the State of Ohio and the State of Pennsylvania will be authorized to tax this property as property, or whether it will be held to be property that is not to be taxed?

Mr. NELSON. I think there is nothing in the bill that would prevent that. That is my understanding.

I will say to the Senator from Colorado that he probably has observed that the committee carefully considered the bill and reported amendments to keep the bill within proper bounds, so as to safeguard the rights of the States in every particular as far as was necessary; and I think the Senator will discover as we proceed with the consideration of the committee amendments that we have amply protected the States in that respect.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that is a matter which, I suppose, the Representatives of the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio ought to have more concern about than I, except that I do not wish to have the precedent established that the Government can charter a canal, a railroad, or any other means of transportation, and relieve it from State taxation and State control so far as interstate commerce is concerned.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Colorado if he has observed the provision in the twenty-second section, on the last page of the bill?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; I have observed that. I will simply say, however, that if I had drawn that provision I should have drawn it a little more positively, and provided that the States reserve the right to tax even against the Government of the United States.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I will state, for the information of the Senator from Colorado, that, in the opinion of the committee and of the gentlemen making application for this legislation, there is nothing to prevent either the State of Ohio or the State of Pennsylvania from taxing the franchises and property of this corporation and exercising all the sovereign prerogatives of sovereign States in connection therewith.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not myself believe that Congress can charter a corporation of this kind and exempt its property from taxation. There is—I can hardly call it dicta—an expression by the Supreme Court which would seem to sustain that view as to what it could do in a certain case. I will admit that the General Government can exempt certain things from taxation—the property of the United States, for instance—and I do not know but Congress could, in certain cases, organize a company to perform some services for the Government direct, where it might possibly exempt it from taxation, but I deny that it can properly do it in a case of this kind.

I want to deny the right of the General Government at any time to create a mere commercial agency for the transportation of property under the interstate-commerce provision or any other provision of the Constitution and exempt it from taxation.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think the States could tax the franchise of a corporation created by the General Government to operate a canal as contradistinguished from its physical property?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that is not a question that I care to enter upon just now.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that the Supreme Court of the United States have decided explicitly that they can not tax it.

Mr. TELLER. That is not the question I was discussing. There is a very great difference between taxing the franchise and taxing the property.

Mr. SPOONER. I had reference to the statement of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania as to what his opinion was.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if this were an original question, I would say to the Senator from Wisconsin, if I had been authorized to determine that question, that I should not hesitate to say when the Government of the United States created an organization they could tax that organization in any way they saw fit if they were not prohibited from doing so by the rights of the States. If it were a pure corporation in the District of Columbia, I think they might and ought to tax its franchise. I think a State ought to be allowed to impose a franchise tax if it sees fit.

But I am not raising that question. I believe when this bill is properly construed the property of the canal corporation will be subject to taxation by the State of Pennsylvania as to such parts as are within Pennsylvania, and by the State of Ohio as to such parts as are within that State. If the Government has any right to charter this corporation at all, it is because it is in the interest of the promotion of interstate commerce. That I am not going to deny. But I think in this case they have gone further. This proposed canal will go from one State into another——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; I do.

Mr. NELSON. The proposed canal is to connect the waters of the Ohio with Lake Erie. When that connection is made, boats can pass from Duluth, Minn., through Lake Superior, clear down into the Ohio River. It perfects and completes an interstate water course extending from the headwaters of Lake Superior clear to the Gulf of Mexico. If it were only to connect the waters of the State of Ohio with the waters of the State of Pennsylvania, it would be a small matter, but it affects more than twenty-five different States and the commerce of more than twenty-five States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I fully understand that; but the principle is the same whether it connects the waters of one State with another State or with the waters of several other States. I am not questioning the right of the Government of the United States to charter an agency of interstate commerce, but I do question whether this bill does not go beyond that when it provides for lateral branches in the State of Ohio.

The proposed canal, I think, is an important canal, and I am not going to contend that it is not. It is one that I will be glad to see built, if it is built in a proper manner and under proper restrictions. I do not think, however, that that is the place to connect the Great Lakes with the canal. I think the canal should commence in the neighborhood of the city of Chicago and extend down to the Illinois River, thence flowing into the Mississippi River, and so to the Gulf. Some day I hope that may be done, though it will require, undoubtedly, the assistance of the General Government.

All I want is to have it established, if I can, that this bill is not to create a precedent that will enable some one to turn up here some day and say, "You did this in the case of the Lake Erie and Ohio River ship canal, and thereby have established a precedent by which the Government will practically take control of the commerce of the States by corporations of its creation."

So far as my political feelings and my ideas about these matters have always gone, I am a nationalist in the broadest sense of the term. I believe in the National Government. I believe that every function that can be discharged by the National Government should be discharged in the fullest possible manner, where there is not any limitation or restriction upon it; but when it comes to questions of this kind, then I believe the States are, in the first instance, supreme, and that the great business of this country must be done under the control and direction of the States and not under the nation.

The Government of the United States was given power to regulate commerce not simply between the people of two neighboring States, but between all the States, and between all the States and foreign countries. I believe that the people of the States of Washington, Oregon, Nevada, and the west coast are, as I believe the people of New England are, better acquainted with their needs and wants and better prepared to discharge their duties in respect to those needs and wants than are the whole people of the United States. I want simply to maintain the relation that has always existed heretofore between the States and the General Government. That is all. I want to enter a protest, so far as anything in this bill will mean more than that.

There are some things in the bill which, if I had an opportunity, I could have tried to have eliminated. For instance, I notice a provision that has been put in the bill since it came to the Senate that no water can be taken from the Niagara River. We have had before us a bill to prevent citizens of the State of New York from taking water out of the Niagara River at Niagara Falls. Just so far as the taking of the water out of the Niagara River may interfere with navigation, the Government of the United States has a voice in the matter, but absolutely none otherwise. The Niagara River is not, except in one part of it, a navigable river, and water may be taken out of it without interfering with navigation. This proposed canal company ought to have the right, if they can do it without interfering with navigation, to take water out of that river; and the Government of the United States has neither the right nor the power, in my judgment, to interdict such action unless it would interfere with the navigable character of that stream.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I simply want to remind the Senator from Colorado that the Niagara River is a boundary stream, and the question of water flow must be settled by treaty arrangement with Great Britain.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care to go into that discussion, except to say that by international law we are allowed to exercise all the powers over our part of the stream we would have if the whole stream were in the United States. We can take water out of it or we can sail on it if we choose. That matter, Mr. President, has been settled by a great many controversies, and there is ample authority for that statement. If the Senator will look at the opinion rendered some years ago by Mr. Harmon, the Attorney-General, he will find a very exhaustive exposition as to the rights of border countries on the rivers which separate them.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him again—I have no desire to interfere with him—this matter is now before the Senate in a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations and a proposed treaty with Great Britain which undertakes to settle the question. That treaty is now on the Executive Calendar of the Senate and will settle that whole question. The report refers to all the authorities which the Senator has cited and with which he is very familiar.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am quite aware of that. I am quite aware that there is a treaty here pending. I have not had time to give it close examination, but I am free to say, from what I know of it, that it is a treaty that never ought to have been negotiated and never ought to be ratified by the United States Government. I will say that if it is in the open Senate. We are called upon in that treaty to make concessions that the law of nations does not require us to make. However, that has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be considered as an opponent of this or any other canal. I would like to see the Government of the United States build a ship canal from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico; and some day I have no doubt that will be done. I would like to see the Government do many things in that line in the interest of commerce, which it is not likely to do, but which it has the power to do. If the proposition were to have the Government itself build this canal in the interest of commerce, I should not particularly object, and I do not now object, except that I do not think the bill is as properly guarded as it might be. While it probably is my duty, if I do not like a bill, to try to have it amended, just now in the condition the Senate is in, in the last hours of the session, as it were, with everything pressing upon us, there is no one, unless it is somebody directly interested in the bill, who can spare the time to attempt to make it such a bill as it ought to be.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, I am somewhat familiar with the provisions of this bill. I think the matter was fully considered, every possible objection weighed, and the rights and interests of the States as well as those of private citizens properly guarded. I think, Mr. President, it is a fortunate circumstance that we have found capital enough in the United States to build this canal without asking the United States to build it. It has long been in the public mind. For fifty years the question of the building of a canal to connect Lake Erie with the Ohio River has been agitated. The question has always been, Would the Government father such a scheme or enterprise owing to its national importance?

Mr. President, the greatest freight-producing river in the United States and perhaps in the world is the Ohio River. There is a billion dollars' worth of commerce on the Ohio River, and if this canal is constructed, as I think and hope it will be, vessels from Duluth and from all the Lake points can find an outlet through the Ohio River, down the Mississippi River, with the products of the States on the Lakes——

Mr. PENROSE. And from New England.

Mr. ELKINS. And from New England, as well as twenty-five States of the Union, not to speak of products that may be destined to the Orient, and find all water transportation, instead of part rail and part water.

Mr. President, this enterprise affects most beneficially and immediately the States of West Virginia and Pennsylvania. Take the State of West Virginia. The Government has improved the Monongahela River, the Ohio River, the Little Kanawha, the Big Kanawha, and the Big Sandy. There are four rivers in the State of West Virginia, improved by the Government, which empty into the Ohio River. All those important waterways carry coal. Coal can be loaded in vessels carrying 600 to 1,500 tons and reach all the Lake ports, both in this country and Canada, and thus afford an outlet at a rate for transportation possibly one-half of what the railroads charge. Besides that, the products of West Virginia and Pennsylvania will be able not only to reach Duluth, but all intermediate points and Chicago by water all the way, and by using the Erie Canal can get to New York City and to New England ports, to which transportation now by rail is very high.

I know of no enterprise that would have such an important beneficial effect on the development of the interior commerce of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia as the building of this canal, and all without a dollar's expense to the United States.

As I said before, every interest is guarded and protected by this bill. Not only did the House pass upon it first, but amendments that were suggested in the Senate Committee on Commerce and made by the committee were submitted to the War Department and have the approval of the Department. I think everything has been done that possibly could be done in the way of safeguarding private and public interests. As I said, I know of no enterprise which would have the far-reaching effect that the building of this canal will have, and I hope to see the bill pass substantially as it came from the committee, where it had the most careful consideration. In my opinion, the business on these waterways in the long future, I will not say immediately, will be increased 50 per cent, and it will be done at a cost which railroads can not haul the products. The effect upon Ohio River and Mississippi River States will be magical. There is nothing in the history of the development of the country to compare with the building of this canal, and I hope to see the bill pass substantially as it has been reported to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is not very pleasant to antagonize a measure in the passage of which Senators have a deep interest, and nothing would induce me to do so in this instance but the conviction, and the very firm conviction, that this is an improper piece of legislation. If I were sure that the bill would pass, I would still feel it my duty to state some of the reasons at least why I can not give it my support.

Everything which is said with reference to the magnitude of this work and its importance I will freely grant, and for the purpose of the objection I may have, it may be fully conceded. My objection is to the work being authorized by an incorporation of the United States, a charter granted by the Government of the United States. It is not in my opinion a proper enterprise for the Government of the United States considered by itself, and considered as to the precedent which will be established, and as to the wide departure upon which we will thus enter, I think it is very much more objectionable than simply when considered as an isolated piece of legislation.

I know, Mr. President, that it is now the vogue to look askance at any suggestion that there is any function which the Federal Government should not perform, and to look with still more disfavor upon the suggestion that there is any remaining function which ought to belong to a State and to be exercised solely by a State, and upon the exercise of which the Federal Government should not intrude. And yet we are here as representatives of States, and we of all officials in the Government of the United States ought to be jealous that the functions which do properly belong to a State should be exercised by a State and not be usurped or exercised by the General Government.

Of course, Mr. President, there are certain claims which have been made in times past as to where that line of demarcation between the Federal function and the State function, or Federal power and State power begins or ends—questions raised in the past which are now settled definitely and finally, and the questions thus formerly involved are forever outside of the domain of dispute or discussion. But there are still important matters in which that line of distinction should be regarded by all of the Government, some matters in which the functions of the States are to be guarded, and especially by us, as the representatives of States.

The dual capacity of this Government is its most distinctive and its most valuable feature, and the larger the country grows and the more numerous the States, the more important becomes the preservation of that feature, because where the General Government legislates, it legislates for the entire country, and legislation which may suit one part of the country does not always suit another, and for that reason, and out of it, grows the great demand and necessity and importance of local government for local affairs and the great importance that the Federal Government shall confine itself to the functions, the necessity for which called it into being.

It is manifest that there is an increasing tendency and practice to devolve in great degree upon the Federal Government the functions which have heretofore been exercised by the States. There is scarcely a public need but that to satisfy it in some shape recourse is had to Congressional or Executive action. Conceding that much of this encroachment is due to the increasing business of the country and the increasing intimacy of the business relations between the people of the different States, and can not be avoided, the fact of such tendency in cases which can not well be resisted makes it all the more important that the legitimate functions of the States should not be invaded or infringed upon in cases where no public interest requires that Congress should do so.

Mr. President, it is a well-recognized rule, one we apparently forget, but none the less fully established by the decisions of the courts, that the Federal Government has no right or authority to grant a charter of incorporation except for the performance of some governmental function. Of course I can not to-day enter into an elaborate argument on this question, and I do not propose to attempt to do so. I am very sorry, indeed, that this bill comes up at the stage of the session spoken of by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], when the Senate would be impatient at anything like an extended argument upon these special questions, great and fundamental as they are, and I do no more than to allude to them.

I recognize the fact, Mr. President, that perhaps this particular bill might be held by the courts to be constitutional, but that is not the sole question which should control us. When we as lawmakers come to make a law, we are to be controlled by the larger consideration than what the courts will hold. We are to be controlled by what we deem to be the intent and purpose of the Constitution in conferring upon us all power of legislation.

On this particular question, to omit anything which may be more general, and coming down to the specific question here, of course I recognize that there are agencies of interstate commerce which it is proper that Congress should inaugurate and should charter, if you please. I recognize further that there is a general principle upon which the courts might hold an incorporation to be a constitutional act, which at the same time would not be a legitimate and proper and constitutional exercise of our functions on our part; and I illustrate by this particular case.

There is no doubt that where the object of an incorporation is primarily and truthfully to subserve a great governmental function, that the act is not only one which the courts will hold to be constitutional, but a law in the passage of which we will have discharged our duty and will have in no manner contravened the spirit and design of the Constitution. I recognize, further, that an act of incorporation may be passed and words included in it, as in this act, relative to the carriage of troops and the carriage of the mails, etc., which courts could not dispute or call in question as to the sincerity of Congress in the use thereof, and on account of which words the courts would hold it was a legitimate and constitutional act; but in such case, if the words are inserted for the purpose of giving jurisdiction for such legislation, and such expressed purpose is not the purpose, and where there is no Federal public function to be performed calling for such incorporation, we have transcended our duty when we take advantage of such phraseology for the purpose of placing an improper enactment beyond the condemnation of the courts.

Mr. President, the line is drawn somewhere in the enactment of charters between those which are legitimately for the purpose of enabling the Government to perform some governmental function and the other class which are not for the purpose of the performance of any governmental function, where the line is so indistinct that courts can not assume to draw the distinction, but must depend on the recitations in the act, and where it must be left to our conscience as to whether we will place the proposed legislation on the one side or the other. That proposition was recognized by Mr. Webster in the argument which he made before the Supreme Court in the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden. Senators are all familiar doubtless with that leading case, and know the fact that it grew out of the attempt of the State of New York to license all steamboats which did business in the waters of New York. It was given as a monopoly to Livingston and Fulton and their assigns. Ogden was their assignee. Gibbons, owning a steamboat in New Jersey, attempted to do business between the town of Elizabeth, in New Jersey, and the city of New York, and an injunction, under the laws of New York, was applied for to restrain the owner of that boat from doing business between those two points in the absence of a license from the assignee under the law of New York.

That injunction was granted in New York and sustained by the highest court there, and came to the Supreme Court of the United States on an appeal from the judgment of the highest court of New York. The State of New York or those representing the law of New York in that particular case, the appellees, attempted to maintain the authority of the State of New York to impose this license upon the proposition that there was a concurrent authority between the States and the United States in the regulation of interstate commerce. When that proposition was controverted by Mr. Webster, the conclusion to be drawn from that position of Mr. Webster was suggested by counsel for the appellees, that if there was not a concurrent power in a State and in the United States Government, necessarily not only as to that important matter of interstate commerce, but as to all the agencies of interstate commerce (which would include every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce), there was an exclusive power in the General Government and none in the State, and the wide-reaching consequences of such conclusion were urged against it. To that Mr. Webster made this reply, and it was for the purpose of reading it that I have made this somewhat extended statement.

Mr. Webster took the position that it was necessarily a question to be determined by Congress as to what were matters of such gravity and so essential concerning the governmental function as would authorize the power to be exercised by Congress, and what were matters not of such an essentially governmental nature as would leave them without that particular class. Mr. Webster used this language:

> Now, what was the inevitable consequence of this mode of reasoning?—

Replying to the suggestion I have just repeated—

> Does it not admit the power of Congress at once, upon all these minor objects of legislation? If all these be regulations of commerce, within the meaning of the Constitution, then, certainly, Congress having a concurrent power to regulate commerce, may establish ferries, turnpikes, bridges, etc., and provide for all this detail of interior legislation. To sustain the interference of the State, in a high concern of maritime commerce, the argument adopts a principle which acknowledges the right of Congress over a vast scope of internal legislation, which no one has heretofore supposed to be within its powers.

And going on:

> But this is not all; for it is admitted that when Congress and the States have power to legislate over the same subject, the power of Congress, when exercised, controls or extinguishes the State power, and therefore the consequence would seem to follow from the argument that all State legislation over such subjects as have been mentioned is at all times liable to the superior power of Congress, a consequence which no one would admit for a moment.
> The truth was, he thought—

The report giving Mr. Webster's argument in the third person—

> The truth was, he thought that all these things were, in their general character, rather regulations of police than of commerce, in the constitutional understanding of that term. A road, indeed, might be a matter of great commercial concern. In many cases it is so, and when it is so, he thought there was no doubt of the power of Congress to make it.
> But, generally speaking, roads and bridges and ferries, though, of course, they affect commerce and intercourse, do not obtain that importance and elevation as to be deemed commercial regulations.

This sentence which follows is the particular point I have in mind in reading this extract:

> A reasonable construction must be given to the Constitution, and such construction is as necessary to the just power of the States as to the authority of Congress.

Mr. President, without elaborating that, the proposition upon which I rest my opposition to this bill, so far as this part of it is concerned, is that this enterprise is not for the purpose of carrying out any great governmental function, unless Senators are prepared to take the position that in every case where the agency proposed to be incorporated can be used in interstate commerce, Congress can be legitimately called upon to incorporate it for the purpose of carrying on commerce.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator says this is not carrying out a governmental function. I would remind the Senator that many hundred million dollars have been spent in the improvement of the rivers referred to by the Senator from West Virginia—the Ohio and the Mississippi—to secure inland water transportation, and the incorporation of this company, that this vast expenditure may be added to by private enterprise, certainly may be considered to be in the line of that governmental policy and that governmental function. It is certainly a laudable governmental function which permits the private individual to contribute and does not make application to the Treasury of the United States for the canal.

I simply submit to the Senator whether this is not a part of a governmental function which is established in the United States, once opposed as unconstitutional and beyond the constitutional limits of the Government, but now established—the improvement of the internal waterways of the country.

Mr. BACON. In reply to the Senator, while of course to follow his suggestion might involve a much more extended argument than I would now like to impose upon the Senate, I will simply say this: It is a very great mistake, in the definition of what may be considered a governmental function, to make such an application of it as the Senator now proposes. If what he says is correct, then let me say that the harbor of New York has had a good deal of money spent upon it to make it the great harbor it is, and if the application now suggested by the Senator is a correct one, it might equally be applied to every steamboat that goes to the city of New York, plying between the city of New York and any other port in the United States. It might be said that any line of boats that comes into any port of the United States upon which the Government has made improvements has thereby become so identified with the performance of a governmental function that the company owning it should receive a charter at the hands of Congress.

Now, what I was saying at the time I had the interruption from the learned Senator is this: If this is to be recognized as a proper thing to do, if every agency engaged in interstate commerce is in the performance of a governmental function such as is suggested, then the time is to come when every enterprise of any kind engaged in interstate commerce will apply to Congress for a charter.

I should like to be told, Mr. President, what argument can be advanced with respect to a canal which goes from one State into another, which thereby asserts that such canal becomes an agency of interstate commerce, and that the company constructing it should for that reason be the recipient of a charter at the hands of Congress, which will not apply with equal force to a railroad running from one State into another.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. PENROSE. I will answer the Senator. It is a part of an enormous system of slack-water navigation which the Government is now developing at the expense of the Government. This is an important connecting link, to be built by private enterprise, and the opinion of almost every one who has studied the question is that the work should be done under the control of the United States, that it should be subject to its inspection and regulation, and ultimately will come within the control and possession of the Government.

Mr. BACON. I do not understand that that is any reply to what I was saying. The Senator says the opinion is it should be so. I am trying to show that such an opinion is not a correct opinion.

Mr. President, if the link between the two waterways of which the Senator speaks was a railroad link, would it not have an equal right to claim that it should be chartered by the Government?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator denying the power of Congress to incorporate a railway company to construct a railroad from one State to another, or across the continent, if you please?

Mr. BACON. No; I am not denying that. I am not denying the general proposition that Congress has a right——

Mr. SPOONER. How would the Senator justify that? Under what part or clause of the Constitution would he justify it?

Mr. BACON. The Senator did not give me his entire attention in the remarks which I submitted in the beginning, but I will take pleasure in repeating my statement.

Mr. SPOONER. I always listen to the Senator when I am permitted to.

Mr. BACON. I recognize the fact that it is sometimes very difficult in this Chamber.

I had said, Mr. President, that I recognize that there are a great many charters which might be granted by Congress which would be upheld by the courts as constitutional, but which would not be charters which we in the performance of our constitutional duty could properly grant. I illustrated it by the statement that wherever there was the performance of a governmental function, it made the action of Congress constitutional in granting the charter, not only as to railroads, but as to any other corporation; that the courts could not look behind the language used to see whether or not the use of such language was in fact the desire on the part of Congress to secure the performance of a governmental function which induced the passage of such a law, or whether the use of such language was merely a makeweight, as it were, a device by which freedom from condemnation by the courts on account of unconstitutionality was to be secured; but that the high duty was upon us when we came to legislate to see to it not only that under the language used in a law it would be held to be constitutional by the courts, but that according to the spirit and intent of the Constitution it is under the facts and the real purpose, such a corporation as is designed by the Constitution to be made by the Congress; whether in deed and in truth the object is to secure the performance of a great governmental function, or whether the object is otherwise, and that the complexion of governmental function given to it is in truth simply to insure its freedom from condemnation by the courts.

I had gone on to speak of the fact that while there was the general recognition of the power of Congress to charter corporations for great governmental interests, corporations, if you please, where that principal interest might have as one of its features interstate commerce, it was the duty of Congress to draw the line between those things which were legitimately of that class and other things which had a primary object of another character, where there was no governmental function the performance of which made the creation of that corporation essential.

The illustration of the Pacific railroads is a common one. I will read in the hearing of the Senator what I intended to read a little later, the statement of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 91 United States, as to the character of the corporation and the conditions and the purposes which justified the Congress in doing that which it is not usual for Congress to do, to wit, charter a railroad company. I am reading from page 88, 91 United States, the decision of the court:

The act—

Speaking there of the Union Pacific Railroad act, in the case of the United States v. The Union Pacific Railroad Company—

> The act, as has been stated, was passed in the midst of war, when the means for national defense were deemed inadequate and the public mind was alive to the necessity of uniting by iron bands the destiny of the Pacific and Atlantic States.
>
> But vast as was the work, limited as were the private resources to build it, the growing wants, as well as the existing and future military necessities of the country, demanded that it be completed. Under the stimulus of these considerations Congress acted, not for the benefit of private persons, nor in their interest, but for an object deemed essential to the security as well as to the prosperity of the nation. (U. S. v. Union Pacific R. R. Co., 91 U. S. Reports, p. 88.)

I read further from the argument of Mr. Webster in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden. Mr. Webster, of course, was not delivering an opinion, but he was "the great expounder," and his utterances are entitled to great weight. There Mr. Webster recognized the necessity of drawing the distinction between the functions which should be recognized as national functions and those which should not be recognized as national functions, even though they were within the same subject-matter. In that case, when counsel representing the appellee, those representing the validity of the act of the State of New York, tried to make application of the argument to show that if what Mr. Webster contended for was true then the governmental function would extend to and relate to and include every agency of interstate commerce, Mr. Webster drew the distinction. He said that such a thing was not to be thought of; that the law must be construed with reference to the proper consideration of the States and also with reference to the needs and necessities of the Government, and should not include matters where the public interest was not the main design, but where the private interest was, in fact, the motive which led to the proposed action on the part of the Government.

I do not know whether I have in this reply made myself clear to the learned Senator or not.

Now, Mr. President, where are we to stop if such a bill as this can be passed and become a law? Who contends that the construction of this canal is necessary for the transportation of troops of the United States, or for the transportation of the mails of the United States, or for the exercise of any other great governmental function? The contention is that it will be an avenue of commerce, that it will be an agency for interstate commerce, and that therefore the charter should be granted. I care not whether it is an agency between two States or between twenty-five States, if that is to be the rule, upon what ground can Congress hereafter ever deny a charter to any proposed agency which shall be or claim to be a means of conducting commerce between the States? When any railroad company, or proposed railroad company, comes to Congress and asks for a charter between the State of Pennsylvania and the State of Ohio or between any other two States, upon what ground can Congress deny it? Upon what ground can Congress deny any charter for any steamboat company that proposes to run a line from the city of Pittsburg to the city of Cincinnati, or from New York to any port along the coast of the United States?

Can we say that Congress will grant such charter in one instance and that it will not grant such charter in another? Is it to be a question whether or not the particular persons who may desire it are those who have influence in the Government? Shall they be favored and shall others with equal right be denied?

Mr. President, if it is not denied, if in all cases we are to act upon such a supposition, what is to become of the legislation of Congress? What will we be doing but sitting here engaged from session's beginning to session's ending in the granting of charters? Because every company will, of course, rather have a charter granted by the United States Government than to have one granted by a State.

But, Mr. President, there are serious considerations of another kind. One of them is this, and I hope I may have the attention of Senators through whose States it is proposed the canal shall run. I would be glad to have the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] for a moment. I say there are serious considerations for States in which enterprises of this kind are to be located.

It may be said that the Senators and Representatives from these particular States do not object, and therefore why should anyone else object? My reply to that is, if this charter is a proper thing it is one which Congress can grant in a State which objects as well as in a State where there is consent.

Now, what is the effect of a charter granted by the United States Government? It becomes the law, not as it does in the case of a Territory or the District of Columbia, by virtue of the law of force in those particular areas, the power which is conferred being thereafter exercised in States only by comity, but a general charter such as this becomes a law governing and controlling in every foot of territory of the United States, including all the States.

Now, what is the effect of that law? In the first place, it takes away from the State of Pennsylvania and the State of Ohio, the two particular States which are most interested in this matter, every right of control of every kind whatsoever in the States, so far as those rights can be asserted in courts. Thereafter no matter of dispute which arises in either of these States can be settled in the courts of those States. It is settled in the removal cases, giving them by their general name, one in 111 United States, I think, and the other in 115 United States, that all matters which arise under a charter granted by Congress are matters arising under the laws of the United States, and that they are, in consequence, under the Constitution, matters within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and not matters which the States can assume and undertake to adjudicate in their own courts.

Here is this wonderful enterprise, vast in its power, tremendous in the capital, with powers in this charter such as I have never seen granted in any charter, and about which I will hereafter speak more in detail if time permits, affecting the entire population not only along the lines of that canal, because there are several of them, but throughout the country both in Ohio and Pennsylvania reached by any of the Allegheny and three or four other rivers tributary. In that vast territory in these States and also in New York, no citizen can be heard in any court of those States, but they must go to the courts of the United States to have their rights adjudicated.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the power of taxation—and I ask the attention of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to this statement as it is somewhat in conflict with what I understand to be his statement—the power of taxation is largely taken away from the State of Pennsylvania and the State of Ohio in regard to this property. It is true that so far as this bill is concerned it stipulates:

> That the corporation hereby created shall be subject, in the respective States in which it does business, to all the laws of said States regulating the taxation of foreign corporations.

Mr. President, of late one very important subject-matter of taxation in corporations is the taxation of the franchises. It has gotten to be a great issue in the United States, an issue which has been settled largely in the United States—that not only the tangible property of a corporation shall be taxed, but that its franchises shall be taxed. Yet the Supreme Court of the United States has determined, in the case of California v. The Railroad Company—I have forgotten the number of the volume—that the franchise of a corporation chartered by the Government of the United States can not be taxed by a State. This immense property, where the franchise is going to constitute possibly the most valuable part of the property, running through Pennsylvania and Ohio, will, so far as that particular value is concerned, be free from liability to State, county, or municipal taxation.

I am speaking now of the hardship upon the communities through which these canals run. I repeat, this is a matter which more particularly concerns the Senators from those States, but as the establishment of a precedent it concerns us all. If powers such as are granted in this charter can be hereafter granted in any charter which promoters of any enterprise may try to get from Congress, then whose State will be next is not known to anyone. When they come for a charter what is done here in this case is to be cited as a precedent.

Now, Mr. President, another thing. I have never known a charter, either Federal or State, where there is such immense power of eminent domain granted as there is in this proposed charter, because not only does it concern the domain to be occupied by the canal, but it concerns the entire domain covered by all of the streams which may be classed among the headwaters of the Ohio, Allegheny, and several other rivers, and all the rivers tributary thereto.

PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. KITTREDGE and Mr. PENROSE addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from South Dakota. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KITTREDGE. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I would appreciate it very much if the Senator from South Dakota would permit the consideration of the Lake Erie and Ohio Ship Canal bill to proceed. I do not understand that it will take much more time. It would be a very great convenience to half a dozen Senators representing States immediately affected by the measure.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I inquire about the length of time that will probably be consumed in the completion of the bill which has been under consideration?

Mr. MORGAN. I shall insist on the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MILLARD] going on if he is ready to proceed and desires to do so.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand objection is made. I ask unanimous consent, with the permission of the Senator from South Dakota, that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska the bill which has been under consideration may be taken up and proceeded with.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it seems that two canals have got into competition, one proposing to be built between Pennsylvania and Lake Erie and one that we have been hammering on and trying to get straightened out here for several years. The Senator from Nebraska is ready to go on; he is chairman of the committee, and I insist that nothing shall interrupt the course of his argument on this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska the bill which has just been under consideration may be further considered.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITTREDGE. That, I assume, is upon the unanimous-consent agreement that it shall in no wise prejudice the pending bill?

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, of course.

Mr. KITTREDGE. The pending bill being the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so understood.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and one of the signers of the minority report, I desire the time of the Senate while I present briefly my objections to the pending bill.

The idea of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama has been in the minds of men for generations. Long before the French people embarked upon the enterprise, expending vast sums of money, explorers had conceived a tentative plan of canal and reported upon its possibilities to one or more of the European powers. The scheme of a waterway across the Isthmus between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean that would meet the requirements of the commerce of the world has engaged the attention of thoughtful men practically ever since the geography of that region became generally known. Within the last twenty-five years the dream of these pioneers has sought realization in various types of canal and in different localities within the limits of the strip of territory between the two continents. As a result of the accumulated knowledge on the subject we have before us to-day plans of two types of canal, the one commonly spoken of as the sea-level type and the other a plan of canal with locks. The question now before the Senate is, Which of the two types submitted would be the better to meet the ends of commerce and to subserve the military interests of this nation?

Obviously the question of the selection of a type of canal according to one or the other of the plans submitted is one hinging largely upon the engineering problems involved. Other considerations have received careful attention, yet upon every page of the reports of the consulting engineers, of the report of the Commission, of the deductions of the Secretary of War based thereon, and, finally, upon the printed evidence adduced before the Senate committee, there is disclosed the fact that the chief considerations, in the minds of all men who have given the subject painstaking study, were those involving the manifold engineering problems in the construction of the canal, its cost, and the period of time required for its building. The testimony taken before the committee on the subject of type of canal has been embodied into a volume of nearly 1,000 pages, devoted for the most part to the many engineering questions encountered, while the long list of names of both Frenchmen and Americans who have investigated the subject shows a large majority to have been professional engineers, most of whom favored the lock type of canal.

This being the case, I have based my conclusions mainly upon the preponderance of evidence and opinion given by the expert engineers of both America and France, not unmindful, however, of other important considerations. I reach the deduction that the plan for a lock-level canal adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission, indorsed by the Secretary of War and approved by the President, as the result of much painstaking investigation, is far preferable to the plan of a sea-level canal submitted to the Senate and as described in the majority report of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

I believe, further, that the enormous cost of a sea-level canal as submitted would not be sustained by the people, since there is every reason to believe that a canal of practical utility and equally good can be built, as the President says, at a cost not more than half that of the proposed sea-level canal, and which can be built in about half the time required for building the low-level canal. Time is a most important element in considering this subject as viewed by the American people.

My conception of the subject is that the American people desire a navigable waterway across the Isthmus at the lowest possible cost, and that they will defeat any plan which contemplates the building of a canal that would cost untold millions. I believe that the 85-foot lock type, as proposed in the plans submitted, would prove after construction to be the ideal canal. In other words, that it would be the type of canal that would better serve the needs of the nation at present and in the future than would any sea-level type that could be constructed within the limits of time and money that can be contemplated. While it is undoubtedly true that if an actual sea-level canal could be constructed of sufficient depth and width, the latter to be not less than, say, 500 feet at the bottom, without any dams or locks, there is no question that it would be the ideal waterway, but this is a type which is purely imaginary, and no thinking man, engineer or otherwise, could seriously sanction the starting in to accomplish any such finality.

The length of time and the immense amount of money which under the most favorable circumstances such a project would cost would most effectually bar its completion during this generation, probably many more.

The ease with which the lock-level canal could be made larger, should necessity ever arise, by simply deepening the approach sea-level channels or by the construction of new locks—ample and favorable location existing to almost any extent—and the simple raising of the spillway of the Gatun dam would enable the depth of water in the lock canal to be increased to any reasonable limit, say to 60 feet of water, if necessary.

Therefore it would appear, taking into consideration all of the elements which enter into the proposition, that it is a safe assertion that the proposed 85-foot lock type of canal is the ideal canal, which is not true of the sea-level type as submitted to the Senate.

In his testimony before the Senate committee, William Barclay Parsons, eminent in his profession and one of the strongest advocates of the sea-level plan, made this qualifying statement, to which I call special attention. He said:

The plan that the minority has submitted is, in my judgment, a feasible scheme. It can be constructed; it can be constructed probably within the limit of cost and time that the minority has set forth. If it was to be regarded as simply a commercial enterprise by a private corporation, that would have to go into the open market and risk its capital, and pay for that capital 5 or 6 or possibly 4 per cent, when commissions and discounts are taken into consideration, and then expect to make a profit over and above that 5 or 6 per cent, I should say that the plan as prepared by the minority would be a perfectly satisfactory plan. It probably represents the least cost at which a canal can be constructed across the Isthmus of Panama. But that is not the case that was presented to you. This is not a canal to be built by a private corporation; it is a canal to be built by the United States Government.

The United States Government, in the first place, instead of having to pay 5 or 6 or more per cent for its money, can borrow it at, say, 2 per cent. The fixed charges, therefore, are reduced to one-third.

It is hardly probable that the American taxpayer would take the view of the case as stated by Mr. Parsons. It goes without saying that the Government has no more right to expend money in excess of actual requirements than has a corporation or individual. In my view of the subject, we are expected by the people to provide for a practicable canal at the lowest possible cost, to be constructed in the shortest possible time. To take any course involving unlimited expenditure would only delay the day of completion of this colossal project and deprive it of the popular favor it now enjoys. If the ultimate aggregate cost of the canal is a matter to be regarded with indifference, as the Senator from South Dakota seems to view it, then, by all means, let us open the Treasury vaults for an annual expenditure of twenty to thirty millions and proceed to build a canal that would realize, when completed, the dreams of those who would merge the waters of the Pacific and the Caribbean Sea by constructing literally the Strait of Panama.

Even in these days of boundless national prosperity the sum of one or perhaps two hundred millions of dollars, in the eyes of the people, is so great that it is staggering. Many Senators here will recall days not so very far back when the appropriation of any such sum would have been impossible in the case of a proposed canal. Who of us is wise enough to say that the nation may never again experience a season of financial depression? Who can say that the time may not come when the people would regard an excess appropriation of that vast sum, when a canal of practical utility can be built without it, as a waste of public money, and criticise any Congress that would be profligate enough to appropriate it? A nation like ours can not afford to pause in the gigantic task by reason of stress of finances, and we should husband our resources and do nothing to impair popular confidence in the ultimate success of the enterprise. The safe course is to build a canal that would be practical for the least possible money. Any other course would be a waste of public treasure which the taxpayers of this nation would be sure to condemn.

In this connection it may be remarked that, if the Panama Canal, when first opened for traffic, should have a tonnage through it of 5,000,000 tons per annum, which is an exceedingly large estimate, and if after that the increase of tonnage through it should be as great as that which has taken place in the last thirty-five years through the Suez Canal, the tonnage passing through the Panama Canal in the year 2000 A. D. would be only about 32,000,000 tons. This is not one-half the capacity of the canal. Witnesses before the committee expressed the opinion that the toll receipts would average a rate in excess of $1 a ton. Mr. Wallace submitted a rate of $1.36 per ton of 2,240 pounds. Should the average rate not fall below $1 a ton, the gross receipts would be about $32,000,000 a year, or a net annual income of nearly $30,000,000, which might be applied toward defraying the cost of building the Strait of Panama, should posterity ever attempt so gigantic an enterprise.

Among the very able men who testified before the Senate committee was Mr. Frederic P. Stearns, chief engineer of the metropolitan water and sewerage board of Boston, recognized not only as one of the great engineers of America, but of the world. His testimony before the committee was remarkably clear and convincing, and I hope every Senator may read it carefully before voting on the bill.

In computing the relative cost of the two proposed plans he took account of the interest charge upon the capital employed in building the great enterprise, and on that point furnished the committee the following estimate, which I will send to the desk and ask that it be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCOTT in the chair). In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Relative amount of interest during construction on lock and sea-level canals.

In both cases assume that the interest is at 2 per cent, compounded annually.

Assume in both cases an expenditure of $50,000,000 in 1904.

In the case of the lock canal assume a total expenditure for the ten years from 1905 to 1915, inclusive, of $14,000,000 per year, making a total of $140,000,000 for construction.

For the sea-level canal assume an expenditure of $14,500,000 in 1904 and of $15,500,000 in each of the next fifteen years, making a total of $247,000,000 for construction.

Interest on sea-level canal if completed in 15 years	$66,297,000
Interest on lock canal if completed in nine years	28,502,000
Difference in favor of lock canal	37,795,000
If the time for constructing the sea-level canal should extend to eighteen years, the interest account would amount to	88,532,000
Deduct, as before, interest on lock canal	28,502,000
Difference in favor of lock canal	60,030,000
The cost of the lock canal, including interest and payments to the Panama Canal Company and the Republic of Panama, would be	219,000,000
The cost of the sea-level canal, including interest and the above payments, based upon the cost as estimated by the Board of Consulting Engineers and fifteen years for completion, would be	363,000,000
The cost of the sea-level canal, including interest and the above payments, based upon the cost as estimated by the Isthmian Canal Commission and eighteen years for completion, would be	410,000,000

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. President, when Mr. Stearns was before the committee I asked him this question:

If you were going to own both canals, which one would you think the best, for the same money and the same time in construction?

And he replied as follows:

I have given that matter very careful consideration. It seems to me that a canal is a means of getting ships across the Isthmus; that it is a question of getting them across, in the first place and most important, safely, and, next in importance, to get them across quickly. In both of these respects I believe the lock canal is the best. It has within its depths and widths ample channels which will permit speed and safety, for while groundings occur in wide channels they occur much more frequently in narrow channels.

I believe that the lock canal has the greater capacity for traffic. When one imagines the traffic approaching 60,000,000 tons per year it will be realized that it would not be practicable to get them through if one ship had to be tied up for every other one that passed, there would be so many in the canal at one time. There would be a demand for widening the sea-level canal before any demand would come for the enlargement of the lock canal, except as individual ships might get to be so large as to require another set of locks, which would not be very costly.

Taking all those things into account, I believe that for the same time and money the lock canal is the better canal. I would give more for it.

Gen. Peter C. Hains testified:

I think I would prefer the lock canal even though the relative costs were about the same.

Chief Engineer John F. Stevens, in his report to the Commission, concluded as follows:

Finally, even at the same cost for time and money for each type, I would favor the adoption of the high-level lock canal plan in preference to that of the proposed sea-level canal. I therefore recommend the adoption of the plan for an 85-foot summit level lock canal, as set forth in the minority report of the Consulting Board of Engineers.

Mr. Alfred Noble, another high authority, the chief engineer of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, testified in committee as follows:

Mr. NOBLE. Certainly; I think that the lock-level canal as planned is a better canal than the sea-level canal as planned—better for the use of commerce, without regard to cost.

Senator TALIAFERRO. If they cost the same?

Mr. NOBLE. If they cost the same. I think that if we had two canals on the route, if it were possible, one built as proposed by the lock-level people and the other built as proposed by the sea-level people, the lock canal when finished would be the better one.

The minority report estimates that eight and one-half years would be required within which to build the lock-level canal, while the majority of the Board estimates that twelve to thirteen years' time would be consumed in the construction of this proposed sea-level canal. The Canal Commission and Chief Engineer Stevens estimate that eighteen or twenty years' time would be required for building this sea-level canal as planned.

Since it must be apparent that an earthquake visitation to a completed canal would be as injurious to the one type as to the other, I will not devote much time to that phase of the subject. Happily the very latest information as to the effects of an earthquake upon the structure of a large dam is that which is appended to the minority report of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals. Neither type of canal can be constructed without a dam, as is shown by the evidence. The opponents of the lock type point to the results of the recent earthquake in California as evidence that great hazard would be taken in the construction of locks in the Panama Canal. There is some misapprehension on this point. In the testimony reference was made to the arch in the old church at Panama, which has stood firmly in place for two centuries, giving indisputable evidence that earthquakes are not common to the Isthmus and need not be regarded as an element of danger there.

In answer to my query, Mr. Frederic P. Stearns said in a recent letter:

It has never seemed to me that at Panama, where as fragile a structure as a church tower has remained intact for centuries, the effects of an earthquake were to be considered in determining the type of a canal, and the recent experience in San Francisco certainly corroborates this view.

Discussing the effects of the earthquake in California, Mr. Stearns, among other things, says:

The fault line south of the San Andreas dam continued through the middle of the long and narrow Crystal Springs reservoir, in which the water is retained by a concrete dam 115 feet high above the natural surface. The reservoir at the time of the earthquake was full. Professor Derleth, after stating that this dam "was subject to a series of thrusts and pulls in vertical planes along its length, since it is parallel to the fault line," adds: "So far as the writer could see, and he examined the dam carefully, there is not the slightest crack."

I know of no mass of masonry in the country that is more like the masonry of the proposed locks at Panama than the Crystal Springs dam. It is located only one-fourth mile from the fault line and has stood the test of the earthquake without being affected.

Mr. President, I have a statement made by Chief Engineer Stevens before a subcommittee of the House of Representatives a few days since. I shall not trouble the Secretary to read it, but I will ask permission that it may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Nebraska will be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MILLARD. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to ask the Senator if the extract to which he refers is in reference to the effects of an earthquake on such work?

Mr. MILLARD. Yes; would the Senator like to have it read?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that that is a proposition in which all are interested.

Mr. MILLARD. Then I will ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. SULLIVAN. That is the point that is not clear in my own mind, Mr. Stevens, and I would like to have it cleared up. I am not an expert by any means. Rather I am almost a total stranger to the Panama Canal yet, and to the terms regarding it. But I understood the advocates of the sea-level canal based their opinion of its expediency largely upon the fact that an earthquake would do great havoc to a lock canal, but would not to a sea-level canal. Now, if you can enlighten me as to the relative degree to which an earthquake would affect both types, I would be glad.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know what is running in other minds. I am not a sea-level advocate, as it is pretty well known. But here is a house, for example; it might be in San Francisco, or may be in Washington, standing in a certain location. Who can say, when there comes an earthquake, whether that house, built of a certain size, will be damaged more than a house twice the size would be? We can not say anything about it. Taking the canal as a whole, there are vulnerable points to attack by an enemy by cannonading or by an earthquake; but, in my judgment, there is no difference between the two types as to which would be the most damaged.

We have a big dam at Gatun. I think that the possibility of its destruction might be entirely eliminated. I do not see how an earthquake could disturb that any more than it could disturb a range of mountains. So far as the locks adjacent to it are concerned, they would be located on natural ground, in rock foundations. I do not see how it is possible for an earthquake to disturb it; and yet again it might be disturbed.

On the other hand, adjacent to the canal is the big Gamboa dam, one hundred and eighty-odd feet, holding 170 feet of water, running back 20 miles—hundreds and hundreds of millions of cubic feet of water. You can imagine a sea-level canal down at the bottom of that gorge; imagine this a dam 170 feet high, running back 20 miles. If an earthquake would disturb a dam in the case of a lock level at Gatun, the same argument would show that it would disturb a dam here at Gamboa. You can imagine what would result if that lake, running back 20 miles, would break into the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. That condition would not exist as to a lock canal?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no dam at that place on that lock canal?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir. I do not think there is any possibility of any earthquake disturbing the Gatun dam. It is a mountain range, 22,000,000 cubic yards, a mile and a half on the base, 135 feet high, with 80 feet of water against it, and over 300 feet thick at the water level; solid packed earth put in there with pumps, which is the most reliable way of putting in earth that is known. In other words, you are building right across the valley there a spur of the mountain range, and I think if you give it a good shake twenty years from now you would solidify it instead of destroying it. [Laughter.] I think you would make it more solid than it was before.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now compare with that the construction of this dam that would hold back the Chagres River.

Mr. STEVENS. They say either a masonry dam—in the majority report I understand they prefer a masonry dam. That would be a curtain of concrete or built-up masonry, according as they might elect to build it. It would be founded upon rock, 122 feet long and 80 feet high; a curtain put up like this [indicating]. If anything on earth could be disturbed by an earthquake, I think that, standing out there practically alone, would be. I should think an earthquake would jar that up a little. [Laughter].

The CHAIRMAN. What is the history in that section of the Isthmus of Panama with respect to earthquakes?

Mr. STEVENS. I can not get a reliable report, for a couple of hundred years at least, that there have been any earthquakes there that have done any particular damage.

The masonry there that the Mexicans and Panamans are still employing is a class of masonry that you would not think would stand up over night. They do not take any particular pains to shape up their rocks, and they use a poor quality of cement and use limewater. They build these walls up four or five stories high and put their finish on. There are old churches there, built two hundred years, with their walls standing there now, which, if they were in Washington or New York or anywhere else, you would have the fire department there before night pulling them down. They have stood there for two hundred years. I cross over and go on the other side of the street when I walk by them.

Mr. SULLIVAN. You think there would be greater danger, then, of loss or damage by earthquake to a sea-level canal than to a lock canal?

Mr. STEVENS. No; I would not want to go on record as saying that, but I think they are about equally vulnerable. I do not think there is any difference particularly.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. President, upon the subject of the probable interference with navigation by reason of admission to the canal, under the sea-level project, of the waters of a number of small streams, I will send to the desk and ask to be read an extract from the written statement of Maj. B. M. Harrod to the Interoceanic Canals Committee, wherein reference is also made to the unknown character of the foundations for dams proposed to be built to divert still other streams from the prism of the sea-level canal. Major Harrod is a member of the Commission. I ask that the statement be read by the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Of the tributaries to be received into the prism of the canal there are twenty-two of considerable size. Two are known to have a flood discharge of over 3,000 cubic feet per second; eight more have discharges of over 1,000 cubic feet per second. Their flood discharges between Gamboa and Bohio may aggregate 30,000 second-feet. They descend into the canal from heights varying from 13 to 160 feet above sea level. The sea-level plan proposes to overcome this difference of level by masonry-stepped aprons, metallic pipes, or by sloping and lowering the beds of the influent streams, although no designs are presented. Professor Burr, in his testimony, describes basins at the mouths of these streams, to strain out the sediment and débris, allowing only the water to enter the canal, but that is a personal suggestion, and does not appear in the plan. This would certainly add materially to the estimate, and it is doubtful whether it would not be more costly to clean out the several basins, which would rapidly fill up, than to dredge the deposit from the canal itself.

I believe that the discharge of 3,000 cubic feet per second into the canal prism of 8,000 feet cross-section would cause cross currents which would prove an absolute obstruction to navigation as long as they prevailed. No ship could hold a direct course under such conditions. She would be driven against the opposite bank. Even lesser discharges would prove proportionately obstructive to navigation.

I believe that the injection of 3,000 cubic feet per second into a canal prism of only 8,000 or 10,000 square feet of sectional area would cause deposit on one side and would abrade the opposite bank unless it were in rock and that these effects, in combination with a current varying from 1 to 2½ miles an hour, would give to those parts of the projected sea-level canal through earthen banks the characteristics of an alluvial stream, which would ultimately establish meanders or sinuosities that would seriously impair the navigability of the canal for all larger ships unless these banks were artificially protected and the bars constantly dredged.

It is proposed in the sea-level plan to divert the Cano, Gigante, and Gigantito from the canal route by four dams and a spillway. These are all in a region of which little is known by survey. The largest of these dams holds a head of water about 70 feet above sea-level, only a few feet less than the Gatun dam, and is about 3,000 feet long. No intimation is given of the method of construction, whether of earth, masonry, or a combination of the two.

The estimate for completing 21 miles of temporary diversion and of several miles of permanent diversion, aggregating many million yards of excavation, for controlling the descent of twenty or more tributaries, by masonry structures, into the canal, and for the building of four dams and a spillway, for which no plan is proposed, in a region where no investigation of foundations has been made, is three and one half millions plus 20 per cent, which I believe will prove entirely inadequate.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask the Senator from what has the Secretary just been reading?

Mr. MILLARD. The statement of Major Harrod, which will be found in the report of the testimony of engineers.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. May I ask if the statement was presented at the hearings before the committee, and if it appears in the hearings?

Mr. MILLARD. It was presented to the committee in a written report, and will be found in the book of testimony of the engineers.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the engineering questions in dispute between the advocates of the respective types. That was done to some extent in the report of the minority members of the committee, presented to the Senate a few days ago, and it is to be presumed that Senators have read much of the testimony on these points as printed in the record of hearings of the committee. It may be that these experts can never agree upon some of the issues raised; but to my mind, as the salient points of either side were developed, the conviction became stronger that the lock type as planned presented fewer disadvantages and higher possibilities than the other. The editor of the Engineering News, in a recent edition, expresses a similar view, to wit:

We have followed carefully the testimony of the various experts who have appeared before the Senate committee during the past four months, and we are unable to find that in any important particular the lock-canal plan, recommended by the minority members of the Consulting Board and adopted by the Canal Commission, has been proved to be faulty.

In the report of the majority members of the Senate committee, and also in the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota in the Senate, emphasis is laid upon the elements of so-called "weakness" in the plan of the Gatun dam, according to measurements submitted by the members of the minority board of consulting engineers. I have not regarded it as of the utmost importance to meet the arguments advanced, in view of the fact, which must be known to all Senators, that either type of canal presented for our consideration embraces various dams of greater or less dimensions, but I can not refrain from citing a few extracts from a letter just received from Mr. Frederic P. Stearns, of Boston, who has made a specialty of the scientific construction of dams. I ask to have it read by the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

* * * Let us examine next the character of the dams proposed in connection with the sea-level plan. There are four of them—the same number as required in the plan for a lock canal.

The greatest dam is that at Gamboa, for the purpose of holding back the waters of the Chagres River. The Board recommended at that place "either an earth dam with a heavy masonry core carried down to bed rock or an all-masonry structure founded at the same depth and upon the same material" (Report, p. 47), in this way giving their approval to an earth dam with a masonry core wall at this place.

The highest flow line of this reservoir is 130 feet above the river bed and 170 feet above the bed rock, which at this place is at sea level. The lake formed by the dam would have an area of 29½ square miles.

In approving an earth dam of this height with a core wall the Board has gone directly contrary to their unqualified opinion that "no vast and doubtful opinion should be indulged in," and that the work should "include only those features which experience has demonstrated to be positively safe and efficient," because no earth dam of any kind has been constructed to retain water to a greater height than about 115 feet, which is held by the dam already referred to, and no earth dam with a concrete core wall has ever been in use in which the height of the core wall has exceeded 125 feet, while in this dam it would require a height of 170 feet.

The board, in the consideration of the subject of dams (Report, p. 46), states:

"The earth dams, which have already been built for the retention of large bodies of water, some of them exceeding 100 feet in height, show that this type of structure may give satisfactory results when properly designed and constructed, but the character of the foundation material on which such dams are built and the means for preventing dangerous seepage underneath or through such foundations must always be carefully considered."

It then proceeds to recommend three dams, respectively, across the rivers Gigante, Gigantito, and Cano Quebrado, without giving any designs, without any engineer having looked at the sites of these dams to determine whether they were favorable or not, and without any boring at their sites to show the character of the material or the depth to rock. That those dams can be built at those places is merely a matter of conjecture, based upon the rough topographical surveys of a large section of territory made by the French before the canal came into the possession of the United States.

* * * In reviewing the dams proposed in connection with the lock canal and with the sea-level canal it can be confidently asserted that the dams of the lock canal have been designed by engineers of the highest reputation in this branch of engineering after a careful examination of their sites and after extended borings to show the character of the material beneath them, and that they do not go beyond the limits of actual practice except in being made more massive and stronger than any dams heretofore constructed to retain the same depth of water. On the other hand, it can be confidently asserted that three out of the four dams of the sea-level canal have not yet been designed, that their sites have not been examined, and that the character of the material or the depth to rock at the sites is entirely unknown. The fourth dam is far beyond the limits of any actual practice.

Mr. MILLARD. I shall speak of one criticism of the lock canal as planned, touching the inadequate length and depth of locks. The judgment of well-informed men is that the locks should be 1,000 feet long in the clear, providing for a depth of water of not less than 45 feet over the sills, and 100 feet wide. I concur in this opinion, because of the constant increase in the dimensions of seagoing ships which has marked the evolution of shipbuilding the last twenty-five years. Those of us who have crossed the ocean occasionally during the last quarter of a century have noted the remarkable advance in the science of shipbuilding. It was something like twenty-seven years ago that I first crossed the Atlantic and took passage in what was then regarded as the largest ocean liner afloat. My recollection is that the length was a little less than 500 feet, with a carrying capacity of a little over 5,000 tons. When we consider what progress has been made in the construction of ocean vessels since that time, in increased length, depth, width, and carrying capacity, may we not look for still further advances as the years go on?

There are now ships in commission or in course of construction practically 800 feet in length, with proportionate depth and width. The idea will suggest itself to Senators that it would be the part of wisdom to anticipate the future and build the locks accordingly, which may be done at an expense not beyond our resources. Not so with the sea-level canal as proposed. It would not be long until such a canal would have to be enlarged and practically built over in order to accommodate the larger ships. In fact, it is reasonable to say that no prudent ship captain would take a big ship into a shallow canal such as is contemplated by the sea-level plan. Should one or the other of the new Cunard liners now under construction enter a sea-level canal as proposed there would be trouble. Can Senators imagine any ship company taking a ship worth three or four millions of dollars, to say nothing about its cargo, through a waterway with rocky sides and foundations containing only 2 feet of water in excess of the draft of the vessel?

The senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] knows a great deal about ships and shipping. I would like to ask him this question: Assuming that you owned one of these large ships which have been referred to—80-foot beam, 800 feet long, and drawing 35 to 38 feet of water (a diagram of which hangs on the wall)—would you be willing to risk the ship or ships of that character in a channel only 150 feet wide, whose rocky walls are high on either side, containing a depth of but 40 feet of water, leaving but 2 to 5 feet below the keel of the ship?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state in reply to the question propounded that the wash or undulation of the water caused by a vessel's movement through it has a tendency to shallow the water under the vessel, and no prudent navigator or commander of a vessel would think of taking his vessel over any bar, except in a case of great emergency, unless there were at least 5 feet of water under the vessel clear, and then it would have to be a still, quiet stream. This wash and undulation of the water by the vessel has the tendency to shallow it several feet.

I remember an instance that occurred some time since in one of our western ports, where an eminent nautical man, in command of one of our battle ships, said it was true there were 5 to 6 feet of good water, according to his soundings, yet he would not think of taking his vessel over that bar or shoal at the time.

Then, again, in answer to the other question as to steering the vessel, in order to have command of a vessel she must have steerage way upon her or she would not answer her helm, unless she was going 5 or 6 knots an hour, without taking up a very great distance. Therefore you must have several degrees of curvature in order to have the vessel answer her helm, to escape from grounding or going into the sides of the canal, whether it is a sea-level canal or a lock canal.

Mr. FORAKER. With the permission of the Senator from Nebraska——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. This is a matter about which some of us have very little information. The Senator from California has just now given us some facts. I should like to ask him a question, if it is not interrupting too much the Senator who is speaking.

Mr. MILLARD. Not at all.

Mr. FORAKER. Would there be any difficulty in steering a ship with a beam of 88 feet through a canal that is 150 feet in width and has a current of less than 3 miles per hour? I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] stated that the current in the canal would probably be 2.64 miles per hour. Would there be any trouble in steering a ship of the width I have indicated, 88 feet—I believe that is the largest ship—through a canal 150 feet in width?

Mr. PERKINS. It would depend in great measure upon the curvature of the canal. If there were abrupt angles, it would be very difficult, indeed, with a long ship. A ship of this great length and beam is far more difficult to steer than a short vessel. I suppose the Senator has run a yacht for a time. Those short vessels will sometimes, to use a nautical term, turn upon their own heels.

Mr. FORAKER. I deny that impeachment. I never ran a yacht. There are many things for which I might apologize, but I never did that.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend is fond of the good things and the pleasures of life, and I know of nothing more exhilarating and invigorating and delightful than to sail a yacht on the wind. Take a short vessel 50 or 60 or 75 feet long. She sometimes, to use a nautical term, will "turn upon her own heel." She will come around within two or three degrees of the compass. But take a long ship——

Mr. FORAKER. I am not asking the question in any controversial sense at all. I want information. Is the curvature of the canal indicated on the map?

Mr. PERKINS. It would be impossible for a ship of that great length and beam to have steerage way unless she was going 8 or 10 miles an hour. That would be necessary in order to have command of the vessel. Such a vessel has a displacement of fifteen or eighteen or twenty thousand tons, and in order to have control of her, in order that she will answer her helm, she must have a steerageway upon which to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from California made an observation that interested me, and I should like to have him explain a little further. He said it is not safe for a great vessel to navigate a waterway unless there is 5 feet of water to the good. My investigations have led me to believe that in our great harbors of the United States the commercial craft that come from abroad—we have very little of our own, I am sorry to say—run into our ports with very much less than 5 feet of water to the good. I should like the Senator to explain the difference between the conditions in our harbors and in the proposed canal, if I state the matter correctly, as I think I do.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator states the matter correctly, and as a result ships frequently run upon a sand bank or a shoal in entering the harbor. The Panama Canal will have a rock bottom, and it would ruin the steel plates on the bottom of the vessel should she graze the sharp crags of the rocks.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator will hardly insist upon that except where accidents occur. Of course if they run over a bar they may get grounded, but as a rule they have no trouble.

Mr. PERKINS. As a rule a ship of a displacement of from sixteen to twenty thousand tons should not cross turbulent water, and it is not safe for it to do so, unless there is at least from 4 to 5 feet under her to the good—clear water.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do you call the canal turbulent?

Mr. PERKINS. No. I think the canal will be still water. At the same time it is too small a margin for the vessel. It would be strained and would suffer injury thereby, and the underwriters would insist, I think, that there should be at least that amount of water under her.

Mr. KEAN. I wish to ask the Senator from California how much water the men-of-war of the United States draw?

Mr. PERKINS. They draw from 25 to 30 feet.

Mr. KEAN. Take the harbor of New York; what is the depth there?

Mr. PERKINS. In the harbor of New York the depth is from 35 to 38 feet at high water.

Mr. KEAN. I think you will find little of that depth.

Mr. PERKINS. A few months since I went on a ship up the harbor. It was thick, and the sailor was in the forechains throwing the lead, and he called out "6 fathoms," "hawmark," "6 fathoms;" nothing less than 5 fathoms, I think. He so reported to the officer on the bridge.

Mr. KEAN. That was very well for that place.

Mr. PERKINS. It was New York Harbor.

Mr. KEAN. But that is not true of the whole channel; and New York Harbor is the greatest harbor in the country.

Mr. PERKINS. No; San Francisco is.

Mr. KEAN. San Francisco may have been great.

Mr. PERKINS. The harbor is all right now.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I simply wanted to ask the Senator whether he would prefer to go on with his speech or have some of the rest of us speak.

Mr. MILLARD. I would rather proceed, Senator, at the present time.

Just at this particular time I should like to have read the testimony on the point which we are talking about given by Mr. Stevens before the House Committee on Appropriations, on page 102.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. STEVENS. I think there is a good deal of mistiness in the average mind on this subject—perhaps not on the part of you gentlemen, but in the newspapers and elsewhere they picture in their minds something entirely different from what a sea-level canal actually would be. There is something very attractive about that word; there was to me before I went down there and saw the conditions that existed there. Then I was a sea-level canal man all right, but I think differently now. A man sees in his mind a picture of that nice blue rippling water through a large strait and sees ships moving through it.

Now, you can put this picture on the plates of your minds: You would have practically, under this present majority report of a sea-level canal, a little, narrow, tortuous strip, the sewer of the country, down at the bottom of everything, with torrential mountain streams pouring down there into it with a fall of from 15 to 130 feet. You have got a current there which, from the best scientific authority we can get, figures out 3 miles an hour. This is a channel 150 feet wide nearly the entire way, only 150 feet wide at the bottom, with sharp curvature, and less than twice the width of the vessel that will have to navigate it, with from 2 to 4 feet of water under their keels, going against a current of nearly 3 miles an hour, which would require them to run at least 7 miles an hour to keep steerageway with their own steam. I do not think there is a shipowner or a ship company on earth that would put a ship through that canal. I know of one that would not. I do not believe a United States battle ship could go through that canal safely. It would be aground all the time.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator asked me a question, and while I was endeavoring to answer it, my friend the Senator from Ohio asked me a question. Since then I have looked at the diagram of the vessel, and I wish to ask, with the permission of my friend the Senator from Nebraska, a question of my friend the Senator from Ohio. Those ships are 88 feet beam. Two of them would be 176 feet. The canal is to be 150 feet wide. I wish to ask my friend the Senator from Ohio how these two ships would pass each other in the canal?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not pretend to be an expert on this business. I interrupted the Senator from Nebraska to ask a question of the Senator from California in order to get some information. But I will say to the Senator, in answer, that this occurs to me: I am told that those are the two largest ships ever constructed. They are only now being constructed. I do not know where they are being constructed, but somewhere in Great Britain, I believe. I do not know what trade they are to ply in. I will ask the Senator, in answer, if there are only two such ships in the world, what he thinks is the degree of probability that those two ships will ever meet in the canal?

Mr. PERKINS. There are a great many vessels that are 60 to 75 feet breadth of beam, and they will frequently pass through the canal, if it is to be a financial success, and, as the piece of poetry runs, they will not "pass in the night." They will speak each other in passing. It is physically impossible for two ships 60 to 75 feet beam each, either in the daytime or the nighttime to pass each other in the canal.

Mr. FORAKER. If it does not interrupt the Senator from Nebraska too much, I will say further in answer to the Senator that I understand it is only for a limited part of the way that the canal is as narrow as 150 feet.

Mr. HOPKINS. Nineteen or 20 miles.

Mr. FORAKER. Nineteen or 20 miles out of 49?

Mr. HOPKINS. Out of 49.

Mr. FORAKER. For something like 30 miles the canal is much wider. I suppose there will be telephonic communication, and when the two greatest ships in the world are to go through the canal at the same time there will be the precaution taken of having them pass at a wider place, and not at the narrowest that can be found.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that at other points the canal is 200 feet wide, but for a distance of between 19 and 20 miles it is only a hundred and fifty feet.

Mr. FORAKER. Then it might be, if we were going to have a sea-level canal, that I would conclude to make it wider.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is right. That is what we contend. If you are going to have a sea-level canal, have one wide enough to meet the commercial exigencies of the day.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I desire to make a suggestion in reply to what the Senator from Ohio said in respect of those being the two largest ships that are now in process of construction and are therefore, of course, exceptional in their character. I wish to call his attention to the fact that the statute which we are now undertaking to execute by the construction of the canal specifically provides that—

> Such canal shall be of sufficient depth as shall afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and such as may be reasonably anticipated.

So even if these ships are exceptional in their character, it is incumbent upon us, in executing this law, to provide for them and such as we may reasonably anticipate in the future in the way of enlargement.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will understand that I was not making the suggestions I did make in any spirit of controversy or in the way of saying anything in opposition to any plan which has been proposed. I was simply answering questions which had been propounded to me by the Senator from California, who is well informed upon all nautical matters, and of whom I had asked some information. It was only that I wanted to be informed, and not that I wanted to use it in any spirit of opposition to anything that anybody is contending for.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I merely want to state that I had not the slightest idea that the suggestion from the Senator from Ohio was intended to indicate any preference as to the type of canal, or any criticism. The only excuse I had for reading to him the provision of the statute was to add to his stock of information upon that subject.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I wish to ask if the plan of canal, as recommended by the President, should be adopted by Congress, whether the Senator from Pennsylvania contends that the canal would be built under the act from which he has just read? As I understand, the President of the United States has recommended a plan of canal proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, and if that recommendation should be adopted by Congress, I take it that specific canal would be built, and not a different canal, to which the Senator has referred in reading from the act of Congress—the Spooner Act—of a few years ago.

Mr. KNOX. If I may be permitted in the time of the Senator from Nebraska to answer the question——

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I will answer it as categorically as I can without going into any argument. It is my opinion that the law requires that whatever canal is built shall be of sufficient capacity to carry vessels of the largest tonnage now in use, or that may be reasonably anticipated.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Then, as I understand, Congress would not be expected to authorize the construction of the canal which the President has recommended?

Mr. KNOX. I do not think there is any such inference to be drawn from anything I have said. I will add further that, in my judgment, the canal proposed here by the minority can be built by the President under the authority of the Spooner Act.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. The locks proposed by the minority, as I understand—and it may be appropriate to speak of the fact now—have a usable length of 770 to 780 feet, and yet for the purpose of showing that a sea-level canal would be inadequate if constructed as proposed by the Board of Consulting Engineers, a diagram is presented here with two ships, the length of each of which is 787 feet. I would ask the Senator to explain how those ships could get through such a lock or such a series of locks?

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. President, I simply gave way for a question. I think I had better proceed.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator allow me right here?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to say, in answer to the Senator from Florida, that these locks are duplicate locks, and the engineers say that six vessels of that character can be accommodated in those locks at the same time.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Will the Senator from Nebraska indulge me for just a moment?

Mr. MILLARD. For a moment.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I do not understand how one vessel of 787 feet, much less six, can be gotten into a lock with a usable length of 770 to 780 feet.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me to say just a word, the conditions upon the Isthmus are such that they can fix the locks at almost any length, and the proposition is to make them so that they will comply with the law as just read by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I think when the Senator from Florida comes to study this subject a little further, even his objections will be dissipated.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, if the Senator will allow me for a moment, I will ask the Senator from Illinois——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Whose proposition is that? You say the proposition is thus and so. Whose proposition is that?

Mr. HOPKINS. The proposition of the engineers.

Mr. MORGAN. No. I have seen no such proposition.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is an engineering proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. I have seen maps drawn up here in connection with the reports of engineers that show locks of certain lengths, three in flight, like the steps up in the reporters' gallery, one above the other. There is not presented to this Congress any plan whatever upon which it will have expressed any opinion when it votes down the sea-level canal. The field is left open for the President or for the engineers who may accord with him to go anywhere they please, provided they build a lock canal. The misfortune of the situation has been all the time that the President has not made any certain recommendations in regard to the canal, and no gentleman representing him has ever dared to present a bill to embody it. Here is some bill here reported by the committee. Why is there not some bill here reported by the committee, either a majority bill or a substitute for this——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MILLARD. For a moment.

Mr. HOPKINS. The bill presented here for a sea-level canal does not provide for four dams, it does not provide for the character of the lock on the Pacific side, and it is otherwise so imperfect that a canal could not be constructed under it.

Mr. MORGAN. That is no answer to my question. If the majority has reported a bill upon the accuracy of which the Senate can not rely, that is their fault. But the Senator will find he is greatly mistaken, because the bill does specify the very report that has been made by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

Mr. MILLARD. I am informed by ship owners and builders that it is reasonable to expect that within the next fifty years the largest vessels may have a length of 1,000 feet, and the experience of the last thirty years would tend to confirm that view. A canal with locks of the increased dimensions suggested would admit the largest ships afloat for years to come and it must be evident that a sea-level canal, as now proposed, would be wholly inadequate for the passage of such ships.

The lock plan has an advantage over the sea-level plan in that the vessels may turn around in either lake and retrace their course. In time of peace and for commercial vessels this is not a matter of much consequence. It would seldom happen that a commercial vessel would have occasion to turn around in the canal, but for the vessels of war of the United States, during the existence of hostilities, the ability to turn around might be a matter of great importance. Suppose, for instance, a fleet of warships, possibly accompanied by transports, were to start through the canal from either direction. While the fleet is on the way news comes that a superior hostile fleet is approaching the opposite end of the canal, and that it is desirable for our fleet not to engage that of the enemy, but to retrace its course. How would the fleet turn around? Every vessel, be the number great or small, would have to be hauled stern foremost out of the canal into the sea in order to turn around; whereas in the lock type of canal each one could run into the lake and do so.

The sea-level canal as projected can not be regarded as a completed project. The alleged facility with which it can be enlarged is made one of the arguments urged in favor of it. But if the canal is to be widened and enlarged soon after its completion, is it fair to consider it a completed structure?

In speaking of the heavy rainfall on the Isthmus of Panama and the amount of water which would find its way into a sea-level canal, in answer to a question (page 93 of the volume of engineers' testimony), Chief Engineer Stevens said:

Yes, sir; with numberless large and small mountain torrents—some of them, in flood times, veritable rivers—which must be taken care of, many of them coming directly into the canal, carrying in, as they must inevitably, silt, perhaps trees, mountain débris of all sorts, rocks, bowlders, etc.; so that I hardly think a comparison between the canal at Suez and one of the same dimensions at Panama is a fair one. This is the point that I wanted to make.

I also send to the desk, and ask that it be read by the Clerk, a statement giving the names of the more important streams which enter the site of the canal, the distance of the point of junction from the Caribbean end of the canal, the height above sea level of their junction with the Chagres, Obispo, or Rio Grande rivers, and the volume of discharge at high stage as far as observed or estimated.

There is a dispute over the estimated values of the lands which would be submerged by the lakes incident to the plan of the proposed lock canal; or, in other words, the overflow of Lake Gatun and Lake Sosa. The subject is treated of in the last chapter of the report of the minority of the Senate committee. The estimates made by the advocates of the sea-level plan touching the value of submerged lands are excessive; and the estimated cost thereof is cited by them as an item of expense that must be added to the total estimated cost of the proposed lock-level canal. I believe there is no ground for placing so high an estimate upon the lands that would be submerged. These figures seem to me to be altogether too high. It is to be regretted that a larger number of Senators have not been able to view the land referred to. I believe the Senator from South Dakota, who presented the majority report of the committee, and myself are the only Senators who have made a recent examination of the locality. My impression is that if any Senator on this floor contemplated purchasing the lands that may be submerged he would hesitate a great deal to pay $7.70 per acre, the price fixed by the Commission, and which I regard as more than fair.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask the Senator what was the value of the crop exported last year from the land proposed to be submerged?

Mr. MILLARD. I do not know.

Mr. KITTREDGE. It exceeded $1,000,000.

Mr. MILLARD. Nor do I believe that the Senator from South Dakota would be willing to exchange twenty sections of the good farming lands in the county in which he resides for all the lands in the Canal Zone between Mindi and Pedro Miguel. It would be just as rational to compare the fertile lands of the greater part of Nebraska, worth $50 to $100 an acre, with the sand hills of the northwestern part of the State, which are of little value in comparison.

The lands on the Ancon Hill purchased by the Commission are, of course, worth much more money than the submerged lands.

A glance at the map of the city of Panama will very easily demonstrate the reason why this tract of land is far more valuable than any other land in the Zone proper, particularly any other land adjacent to Panama.

The city of Panama is situated on a peninsula, or "thumb," running into Panama Bay. It is surrounded on three sides by water, and the only direction in which the city of Panama can grow in the future is over and across the piece of land which was acquired by the Commission for governmental purposes. This land is at the base of the "thumb," so called, and immediately adjoining it on the northwest is the high mountain known as Ancon Hill.

The low-lying swamps are covered by the sea at high tide. To compare in value the trackless jungle, swamps, and lands of such character along the interior of the Zone with that of the tract of land which was acquired by the Commission at Panama would be about as fair as it would be to compare the relative value of the swamps lying along the seacoast in New Jersey, 25 to 50 miles distant from the water front in New York, with values of the high lands along the Hudson River at Weehawken, or opposite the city of New York; or to compare the best residence property which adjoins the thickly built up portion of Washington City with the swamps and marshes which may exist 20 to 50 miles from the site of Washington City down the Potomac River, and any attempt to compare favorably the localities cited would be based either upon ignorance or due to absence of a wish to be fair.

The minority members of the committee have refrained from importuning Senators in behalf of the lock plan as submitted, for it was assumed that every Senator had read the reports of the Commission, the engineers, the Secretary of War, and the views of the minority of the Senate committee. If I am correct in the assumption that Senators have given careful consideration to these reports, and to all the facts bearing upon the question, there can be little doubt of the defeat of the pending bill.

There is nothing in the reports of the engineers, nor in the testimony, raising a doubt of the practicability of the lock type as planned. On the other hand, there is much affirmative evidence that its utility is unquestioned.

The cost of a lock canal, counting interest at 2 per cent, would be less than that of a sea-level canal by $150,000,000 to $200,000,000.

The time required for construction would be much less, thus securing to the nation the benefits of an isthmian canal at the earliest practicable day.

The lock canal as planned would afford more rapid passage to big ships than would the other type, and it would afford also a greater degree of safety to ships, while the wider and deeper channels would minimize the liability of interruption to traffic.

It would afford a canal of greater capacity and therefore be of greater utility to the commercial world, as the sea-level plan contemplates a narrow canal of limited capacity.

Counting interest at the rate of 2 per cent upon the investment for either type, to operate and maintain a lock-level canal would cost less by some $2,000,000 annually as compared with the sea-level plan submitted.

It could be defended against an invasion as readily as could any other type of canal.

In summing up the matter the President said:

Each type has certain disadvantages and certain advantages; but, in my judgment, the disadvantages are fewer and the advantages very much greater in the case of a lock canal. The lock canal at a level of 80 feet or thereabouts would not cost more than half as much to build, and could be built in about half the time, while there would be much less risk connected with building it, and for large ships the transit would be quicker; while, taking into account the interest on the amount saved in building, the actual cost of maintenance would be less.

In concluding these brief observations I wish to say that after listening to the testimony with close attention during the session, after analyzing the written reports and considering them in the light of the evidence adduced, and after a personal survey of the line of the canal, I can not escape the conclusion that a lock-level canal, practically as planned, is far preferable to the sea-level type as proposed, even if the cost and time for construction of both types were the same. I do not think the country would be warranted in spending such enormous sums of money for a sea-level canal when many of the best engineers of the world have given it as the result of their deliberate judgment that a lock canal on the Isthmus of Panama would be of greater practical utility and can be constructed in much less time and for many millions less money. I am hopeful that Senators who have gone fully into the merits of the two plans will sustain the views of the minority of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, I make the usual inquiry whether any Senator desires to address the Senate upon the pending bill. In the absence of any request, or any intimation of that character, I present the following order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota proposes an agreement, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, June 15, 1906, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal, connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction, and continue the consideration thereof until 4 o'clock p. m., when debate shall cease, and a vote be taken upon all amendments then pending or to be offered, and that a vote be taken on the bill before adjournment on that day.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I would want to consult a little longer before I could agree to that order. It is a matter the Senator from South Dakota has had under consideration with different members of the committee. I am not prepared to agree to it at the present time, but, as I said to him, there will be no delay in getting a vote. However, I am not prepared to say that we can take it on Friday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not insist upon his objection. It has been understood, by myself at least, that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] will address the Senate upon the pending bill on Thursday, and that on Friday the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] will address the Senate.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will take the matter up with the Senator to-morrow. I wish to consult a little further before agreeing to a time.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I hope the Senator will not object to the granting of this order. The reason why I suggest that the date should now be fixed for Friday, is that Senators who are absent and desire to return to vote upon the pending bill may have an opportunity to do so, and if they are unable to return for any reason that they may have an opportunity to arrange pairs.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator that I am not prepared to-day to agree to it. I will see the Senator in the morning. If I find others are agreeable to the limit of debate as expressed there, I shall not interpose any objection, but I am not prepared to say now that I could agree to it, or that we could take the vote on Friday.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Of course in the face of an objection I am powerless, but I do hope that the Senator will not insist on his objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator I am not going to try to delay the vote, but I am not prepared to-day to agree to the specific time named.

Mr. KITTREDGE. In view of the fact that no Senator is desirous of speaking upon the unfinished business, I ask unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal bill is to be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I desire, with the consent of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to call up for consideration the report of the conferees upon the statehood bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana for the purpose of considering the conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks for the consideration of the conference report on the "statehood bill," so called—House bill 12707. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BAILEY. The motion to agree to the conference report is debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is. The conference report is before the Senate, and the question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Territories if the conference report has made any change in respect to the location of the capital of the new State of Oklahoma?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It has in the following particulars: It has located the capital temporarily at Guthrie, until 1913, provided that no money shall be appropriated or expended in the meantime for the erection there of any permanent capital buildings.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall not resist an agreement to this conference report, because I believe that the people of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory have already been denied admission to the Union altogether too long. For four years there has been no difference of opinion in the Senate as to their right of self-government as a State, and their just claims in that regard have been postponed to await some settlement of the vexed question with reference to New Mexico and Arizona.

I have never been able to see any political, geographical, or natural connection between the right of the people of Oklahoma and the Indian country to statehood and the same right of the people of New Mexico and Arizona; and I deeply regret that the conferees representing the House could not see their way clear to give to the people of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory their admission promptly and leave this question to be settled between Arizona and New Mexico hereafter.

I do, however, congratulate the Senate, and I congratulate the people of New Mexico and Arizona, that by our persistence we have at least secured to those people the right to determine for themselves whether they shall be admitted jointly and as one State or as separate States into the Union. If it be true that the Territory of Arizona is as much opposed to her forcible annexation to New Mexico as has been represented here, I have no doubt that her people will so express themselves at the ballot box, and thus end once and forever this attempt to unite her against her will to the neighboring Territory.

I shall look forward, too, to the time when even New Mexico, in her own right and as a separate political entity, together with Arizona in her own right and as a separate political entity, shall be admitted as States into the Union, and I sincerely hope that will terminate the struggle of Territories to become States.

If I could have my way, no State would ever be admitted into this Union after those two Territories become Commonwealths. I would settle for all time the problem of the mixed and alien races who now live under our flag and inhabit territory which belongs to us, but which is not treated as a part of us. I would say to them frankly that they can never be admitted into the sisterhood of States; and then I would supplement that denial of all hope on their part of ever becoming States of the Union by allowing them to erect their own governments and pursue the destiny of their own people in their own way.

I would make this Republic a homogeneous one. I would make this Republic a government in which every part by physical contact touched some other part. If I made a single exception to this rule, that single exception should be the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. President, whatever the future may hold for these dependencies and whatever uncertainty may attend their course, the American Congress makes no mistake when it admits to full fellowship in the Union the new State of Oklahoma. Her people are of our kind. They have gathered there from every quarter of our common country, and they have brought with them the highest sentiments of patriotism and integrity from the communities in which they were born.

As no State in the history of the Republic was ever made to wait so long for membership in the Union, so it will happen that no State has ever so rapidly risen to a position of importance and influence in the councils of the nation.

It will be a novel spectacle to see a new State recently admitted equal here, as the great and the small have always been and must always be equal in this Chamber; but in the other branch of Congress this new State will have a representation equal in intelligence and superior in number to some of the ancient Commonwealths.

With her population, with her wealth, with her resources, Mr. President, it does look like she might have been permitted to select her own capital in her own way, and order her domestic affairs according to her own will.

Not only, sir, is she the greatest ever admitted, but you compel her to come into the Union with badges of dishonor and incompetency never before put upon a Commonwealth. You have written it in the enabling act that her people are not to be permitted to deal in their own way with the most vital of all police questions, the regulation of the sale of liquor. If there be one question above all others essentially pertaining to local government, it is the right to determine whether or not intoxicating liquors shall be sold and, if permitted at all, the circumstances and conditions under which the sale may be conducted.

But you have denied that sovereign right to this sovereign State, and you command her to write into her organic law, not the provision which accords with the will and judgment of her people, but the provision which accords with the will and judgment of people in other States. And that yoke of bondage has been put upon her by many Senators who come from States where no such law exists with reference to their people.

I said on another occasion that I am one of the few Senators in this body who, when the question was submitted to his people at home, have supported a constitutional amendment to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, and I am by that action precisely as a friend of mine was about leaving North Carolina—if it was to do over I would do the same thing. But, sir, while I am ready to decide that question for the people of Texas, when it is submitted to them, I protest that the people of other States have no right to say how we shall decide it or when we shall decide it, or whether we shall decide it at all. It is for us to say; and you ought to have left it for the new State of Oklahoma to settle in her own way.

Do you believe she would say what you have said she must? No; for if you believed it, you would not have required it in this enabling act. The very fact that you demand of her to incorporate in her constitution this provision is a testimony that, without your command, she would not adopt such an ordinance.

The pretense—I will not say "pretense," because it is offensive to talk about Senators pretending; Senators do not pretend, and there is enough of false accusation against the Senate and Senators from those who know no better, without my joining in the unjust clamor. Withdrawing that offensive word, I substitute it is argued that the justification for this course lies in the fact that the Government owes some obligation to the Indians. So it does; and it owes them a much higher obligation than it ever has discharged. But I remind Senators that the Indians in that country now are American citizens; and if you want to live up to the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution, you must make no distinction between American citizens on account of their race or their color or their previous condition. The Indians are American citizens, and yet you treat them as children; either it was a wrong to make them citizens when you did it, or else it is wrong to treat them as children now. One or the other must be true. But even if the Indian, panoplied with all the rights of an American citizen, is still to be treated as a child, I appeal against the proposition to deny a million and a half of intelligent American citizens the right to exercise their own judgment in a matter peculiarly local, simply because there happen to live among them something like 50,000 Indians.

But, Mr. President, I waste my breath and I waste the Senate's time. I know, of course, that nothing I could say would induce the Senate to take that obnoxious provision out of the bill. I know that nothing I could say would induce the Senate to amend the capital provision. Therefore I forbear to say more than that, with all the objections I have to this Federal interference with local affairs, I rejoice in an opportunity to vote for a report that at last makes a tardy recognition of the rights of that million and a half of American citizens.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, if I have never offered any remarks or suggestions on this question of these united Territories coming in under single statehood it has not been because I have never thought of the subject, for it is an old one. The Territory of New Mexico has been ready to be admitted into this Union for now nearly fifty years. For my part, I am unable to see why the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico should be permitted to vote as to whether they shall be dragged into the Union with one another reluctantly or not, and why the two greater Territories, Oklahoma and Indian Territory, with four times their population, should be united without leaving it to them. I have yet to see a single soul or to get a single letter or telegram out of the many hundreds I have received that has ever expressed a desire on the part of anyone in the Indian Territory to be united with Oklahoma, except when separate statehood failed. They have asked for me to vote for the Territories to be united in one State only because they have been so persistently told that they could not get entrance to the Union separately.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has told you that here are a million and a half of people. He might have added 300,000 more, as I am informed there is that number in the Territory, covering more area than New England; and the proposed State will have as many votes as the State of Mississippi in the House of Representatives when it is admitted; and yet those Territories are compelled to come in here as one State, whether they will it or not. You are not voting to please the people of the Indian Territory when you bring them in with Oklahoma. I do not admit the right of Congress to do this. I do not deny the power of Congress to do it; but I deny the right. Here are two great Territories, with a great population, greater than that of at least fifteen States of this Union, and yet they are to be compelled to come into the Union as one State; and, I am sorry to say, by Democratic votes, as well as by the united vote of the Republican side of the Chamber.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly; of course.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Mississippi forgets that these Democratic votes were first cast for two States. Two years ago the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] offered an amendment to the bill then pending providing for two States to be formed out of the Territories of Oklahoma and Indian Territory and I, I believe in common with almost all of the Democrats, voted for that; and only when that failed did the Democrats all agree that those Territories had better come in as one State than not to come in at all.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I had not forgotten what the Senator from Texas has called to mind; I had not forgotten any part of this struggle of great communities to take their rightful place in the galaxy of States. If we voted against joint statehood then, we should vote against it now for identically the same reasons. The plea or the reason or the argument that compelled us to do it then, and which will compel some Senators now to vote for this report, has no force now, and is an invalid one. These Territories have waited, and they can wait. They will take such action independently if they are not compelled to come in now as one State. This measure is beyond the reach of Congress, in one sense of the word at least.

I recall the fact that when the people of California organized as a Territory and held a Territorial convention they sent their constitution here, and they were rejected by Congress as a Territory. California responded to that challenge by holding a State convention; and she was admitted as a State, without ever having been recognized by Congress as a Territory.

There is another thing about this. In the interest of fair play, in the interest of that equilibrium of power which the New England States especially struggled for in the Constitutional Convention, in the interest of that equipoise which Connecticut contended for, and which she secured, of two Senators from each State, and with no power to deprive a State of its equal representation in the Senate, except with its consent. That was the very last act of the Constitutional Convention. It was to preserve the power of the States as such. When the Louisiana purchase was made, Josiah Quincy announced upon the floor of the House, after it was consummated by an act of Congress, that it would be a sufficient cause for the secession of the New England States; that by that act, by the accession of new States, they would be denied their equal power in the Confederacy. Now, I want to say to Senators plainly and unequivocally, without any intention of causing offense, that if these two Territories had been in the North not a man on that side of the Chamber would have voted to unite them as one State.

When Dakota applied for admission, having about 200,000 people, she was divided into two States so as to get four Senators at Washington. There are now a dozen Western States that have not the population to-day of the Indian Territory; and there is not a single Senator on the other side who will admit now that he would vote to unite two Territories lying north of Mason and Dixon's line with a united population of 1,800,000 souls—not one of you gentlemen would do so.

I want to say that this whole movement in relation to the admission of these two Territories is to prevent the accession of Senators upon this floor. There is a feeling that there is now a sufficient number of Senators, and probably too many. A small section of the United States, by the dominating influence of its character and its intelligence on this floor and elsewhere, has succeeded in binding the States of the West and East to its chariot wheels of power, and they have marched together under the protective tariff and other devices of legislative skill to a great summit of prosperity. Mere vassals have been brought in, and not coequal States. Because these Territories happen to lie to the South, this measure is forced upon the country and forced upon these two Territories by the Republican majority, assisted by the Democrats on this side of the Chamber. I do not know that there is a single man here who will vote against this report except myself. I never will sanction an outrage of this sort. However inevitable it may be, it shall not have my indorsement. I say that it is a subject of just indignation among the people of these two Territories that they have been compelled to say that they want joint statehood because they have been continually threatened with exclusion from the Union in their relation as States.

Now, Senators, this measure will pass, as I know. I am not saying anything to prevent it; but I simply want to speak my opinion freely about it. I say that every man in this Chamber who votes for it, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, is guilty of exactly the same offense against the people of those two Territories.

Why Arizona and New Mexico should be compelled to vote upon the question of whether or not they are to be united is not a measure that ought to be held to their lips. Each one of them is entitled upon its own merits, from every point of view—from the standpoint of territorial area, of population, of wealth, and especially in the prospective strength of population—to admission as a free and independent State.

The conference committee and the Republican part of the Senate have placed conditions in the constitution of the proposed State of Oklahoma which every single Senator here knows the very moment that Oklahoma becomes a State of this Union will pass for nothing. This Congress can not impose conditions upon a Territory asking for admission that are worth one cent when she has been admitted. When she has entered the Union, she is at that moment the peer of every other State in the Union, and no condition can be imposed upon her that does not rest equally upon every one in the whole sisterhood of States. To make it difficult for those people to take a view of social and domestic matters different from your own, you have embedded certain conditions in the constitution of the proposed State of Oklahoma, because you know it will be more difficult to take them out of the constitution than to put them in. It is an exhibition of that officious, intermeddling character that intrudes itself into everybody else's affairs, of that cant and hypocrisy that undertakes to examine the sins of other people and provide against them, while perfectly unconscious of any guilt in itself. This miserable and detestable feature is the worst thing in this measure, as the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory are compelled to-day by a people who literally care nothing for them, as a matter of fact, and by a prurient desire to constantly interfere officiously with people and to regulate their affairs, whether they be social, domestic, or political.

The people of these Territories can guide themselves. They are sufficient to-day for their own control. I, for my part, having visited every part of this Union, would not give a hundred thousand men in the West for five hundred thousand men in the East. In all of the elements of manhood, in enterprise, in courage, in adventure, in self-respect, they are the equals of one to five, and they can take better care of their morals than can the effete East.

I tell you to-day the criminal statistics of that western country will compare most favorably with those of the great centers of population in the East. You take the history of the East everywhere and see the absolute lack of self-control in that section that has engendered here in the Senate a desire to hedge about a capable and self-respecting people with that control which those who seek to exercise it feel to be absolutely necessary at their own homes. Gentlemen forget that communities in some places may require blue laws and sumptuary laws and restrictions, but that there are other communities that still maintain their individuality and their manhood and that require nothing of the sort. They are quite sufficient for themselves; and I resent this thing for them, as I would resent it for the State of Mississippi.

These Territories have the right, and every organized society has the right to regulate their police power, to look after the health and morals of the community. There is no power anywhere to deny that, and if it is denied it is an unconstitutional denial; it is the denial of a right that is not only constitutional, but it is natural, it is inherent, and it is inalienable.

Senators may vote as they please here, but it will not affect the case at all. In my opinion, the people of the proposed State can assert their rights whenever they choose. I do not speak here to-day as an advocate or the opponent of temperance or prohibition. I have done my part in this life by always having been a temperate man. I voted for a "dry" ticket in my State, but I would not vote, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] says he would, for an amendment to the constitution of the whole State for prohibition or for anything else, because that would be a denial to the counties, which are the integers of the State, of their right of regulating the police power and to say what is best for them. I say that every single community in the world, every organized society, nay, every unorganized society, every settlement and neighborhood of farmers have a right to control their police matters, so far as health goes and so far as organized society goes, as to morals.

Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything on this matter at all, as I have been silent throughout the discussion; but I did not want this measure to pass, as I have to stand alone in my position, without giving the country the reasons which actuate me. I have no desire to debar the citizens of the Territories from their relation as States in this great galaxy. On the contrary, I have always—and I have been here a long time, in one or the other of the Houses—advocated and voted for the admission of every Territory that knocked at the door of the Union for admission. I have always said that the guardianship of a great community by the other great communities was not a normal feature of our institutions. They are all based upon local self-government, upon the sovereignty of the State, upon the knowledge and the capacity and the right of each community to govern itself exactly as it pleases. Take that away, and the whole proud fabric and superstructure of our liberties tumbles to the ground. So in every case I have always voted for the admission of a Territory, and I cared not what its population might be. I knew that in the near future its population would be enough to meet the requirements of the Constitution as to the representation allotted to the Members of the House according to the last census.

So I have continued to desire, and I desire now, that they should be admitted, but I will not consent to the doctrine that this Congress has a right, or that there is a reason that is valid and sound and a fair one, to unite such Territories as Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, embracing a population of about eighteen hundred thousand souls, into one State without asking their consent. The consent that has been given has been an enforced consent. It was not the wish of the people of the Indian Territory. Perhaps it was the wish of Oklahoma, with a desire to reach out and aggrandize itself as much as possible—a natural desire I will admit, but at the same time an encroachment upon the rights of their neighbors in the Indian Territory.

The people in the Indian Territory, I venture to say, are the equals of any people in the United States. I believe more people have gone there from Mississippi than from any other State in the Union, and that alone is a sufficient guaranty of the character of the people of that Territory. People have gone there from Texas, from Arkansas, from Tennessee, from Kentucky, and a great many have gone there from the North. They are hardy pioneers, willing to blaze the way and establish civilization. Towns have grown up like magic there, and everything has demonstrated the absolute capacity of those great people to govern themselves.

The foreigners are hardly to be noticed in that country. There are Indians there, but there is hardly an uncongenial foreign ingredient compared to the black population of Mississippi of 300,000 majority over the whites. If we could deal with this body of incompetents, with their incapacity to govern, how easy it would be to take care of 100,000 Indians of pure blood still in that Territory, who have those high characteristics of manhood and of self-respect that would entitle them after a while to assert all the dignity of citizenship, into which they have been received by acts of Congress and which they themselves have accepted by dissolving their tribal relations.

Mr. President, this Congress has no right, although it has the power, to pass this act. These people should be permitted to say, not with the threat hanging over them that they shall not come in at all unless they come in as one State, but to say freely whether or not they desire to unite. If that opportunity were allowed to the people of the Indian Territory, you would find an expression in the negative that would astonish those who have been accustomed simply to hear it iterated with damnable iteration on this floor that these people want to come into the Union as one united State.

The people of the Indian Territory desire nothing of the sort, though I believe the people of Oklahoma would like to come in with the Indian Territory under the name of the State of Oklahoma. I think Oklahoma has been reaching out for spoil, naturally, as I say, thereby exhibiting a characteristic that belongs to all nations of the world. They all desire to extend their borders; but there is no such land-hunting, land-robbing, land-grabbing, and land-stealing people on the face of the earth as the Anglo-Saxon. They have taken every rock big enough to plant a cabbage on; they have taken territory on every continent, and every island of the sea, and they have held it with the grip of death. They want land; and as it is with the great English-speaking people so it is with Oklahoma. They have reached out to grasp the Indian Territory and have drawn it to their bosom. That greed for power has found its echo here in this Chamber, and these men are to be confirmed in their right to take in the Indian Territory.

I say again, Senators, that in all my communication with the Indian Territory—and it has been very great—I have not found a solitary man who in the first instance desired a union with Oklahoma. Those people desired separate statehood. But they were informed over and over again by the Republicans, especially by the officers of the Territorial government, appointed by the Republican Administration, and afterwards had it echoed to them by Democratic Senators, that they could not secure admission in any other way. So they said, "Well, we will do anything to get in." Why? To relieve themselves of the appointees of the Administration who have gone there. They said,

"Anything to relieve us from the body of this death; anything to put in our hands the right to control ourselves." I for one would prefer that they should wait longer and get their due, their certain just right to come into this Union exactly on a par with the other Territories that have been admitted as States.

If Dakota had been in the South it would have been admitted as one State, with two Senators. Washington and Utah would have been called upon to enter the Union as one State, with two Senators; and if Oklahoma and the Indian Territory had been North, it would have been admitted as four States, and with eight Senators out of that great population and that fine Territory. Yet it is fair play. It is a game of politics, and the weaker must lose. We lose, Senators. We submit to this decree. Our heads are bloody, but they are not bowed. We still feel the injustice of this movement; we still feel that it is a discrimination against our section, and that this act, which is to-day to be approved, is an act that is extremely sectional, extremely political, and is a blow at the equality of the southern part of this Union to equal representation in this Chamber.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, this is the first time for a long while—I believe it is the first time since I have been a member of this body—that I have heard a speech pitched on a sectional key. I do not want to say very much in answer to it, but I do want to say to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] that there is, in my opinion, no occasion for the turbulent condition into which his mind seems to have passed. I say this with the more freedom because I have been in accord with the Senator from Mississippi all the while as to separate, rather than joint, statehood for the two Territories of Oklahoma and Indian Territory. I spoke in favor of that proposition in one of the preceding Congresses, when we had a bill of that kind under consideration, and I tried very hard at that time to get an opportunity to vote for it. I have supported this bill in this respect, and I intend to vote to accept this conference report, notwithstanding these two Territories are jointed together, not that politics has anything to do with it, but because the best interests within our power to subserve require it.

Having the attitude with respect to this matter that I have maintained, I think I have heard as much as any other Senator in this body of the reasons why Senators on this side of the Chamber have voted to join those two Territories together as one State, and I do not think I have heard any Senator on this side of the Chamber give politics or political advantage as a reason.

Mr. President, the Senator talks as though these two Territories are Democratic in their politics, and that the Republican members of the Senate are seeking to obtain some kind of an improper advantage by consolidating them and making only one State of them, so that it can have only two Senators. Perhaps the Senator has not been reading the election returns from Oklahoma. There have not been any returns from the Indian Territory. But in Oklahoma, from the very beginning of the organization of that Territory, from the very beginning of the time when they commenced to vote, the Republican party has been constantly gaining strength. It was found to be a Republican Territory by the vote of 1902, again in 1904, and I have before me, having sent to the Library for it after the Senator made his remarks, the report of the election of last year, when they elected a legislature. The result of that election was eight members of the council, or senate, Republican, and only five Democratic; fifteen Republicans in the house as against eleven Democrats, making a Republican majority of three in the senate and four in the house, or a Republican majority on joint ballot of seven. So it is that Republicanism is gaining all the while. Politics had nothing to do with this provision, for according to the latest indications we would have gained by having them come in as two States.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator thinks I have not been reading the election returns. I am quite familiar with the election returns, and I want to say to him that I do not know of any Territories that do not take the complexion generally of the Administration which appoints the officers who conduct those elections. It is quite common. If the Senator will pardon me, I fully expect every one of these Territories to send Republican Senators and Republican Representatives when they are admitted into this Union, and I do not expect them ever to repeat it.

Mr. FORAKER. I have observed when a Territory or a State takes on the Republican political complexion it generally retains it.

But however that may be, what I wanted to call the Senator's attention to is the fact that I have not heard the reason assigned by him urged by any member of the Senate on this side of the Chamber. The Senator will remember that when Oklahoma Territory was created it was provided in the organic act that Congress reserved the power to reunite, for purposes of statehood, the two Territories, or to deal with them as Congress might see fit. While there has been some objection manifested to a union of the two Territories, there has been comparatively very little. The petitions that I have been receiving have been, as a rule, in favor of joint statehood; certainly in favor of joint statehood if they could not get separate statehood without a contest and without further delay.

But, Mr. President, it was not my purpose to speak particularly of that. Now, I want to say, in answer to the Senator from Texas, that I think he has given more force and effect to this provision prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors than he was warranted by the text in giving to that provision. One hearing the Senator speak would have concluded, I think, that there is a requirement in the enabling act that the State of Oklahoma shall put in her constitution a prohibition against the sale or barter or giving away of intoxicating liquors to anybody within the new State of Oklahoma, to be composed of the two Territories. The Senator will find, if he will take the trouble to look at the text, that the provision is not so broad; that it is so narrow and has such a manifestly proper purpose that I think the Senator upon reflection would not find so much fault with it, at any rate, as he has expressed. The provision is:

> First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship, and that polygamous or plural marriages and the sale, barter, or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians are forever prohibited: Provided, That the sale, barter, or giving away, except for mechanical, medicinal, or scientific purposes, of intoxicating liquors within that part of said State heretofore known as the Indian Territory or other Indian reservations within said State be prohibited for a period of ten years from the date of admission of said State, and thereafter until after the legislature of said State shall otherwise provide.

Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Territories. I have not had this bill especially under consideration. I have given very little attention to its provisions with respect to Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. I have been giving some attention to its provisions with respect to Arizona and New Mexico. But what little I know in a general way of the character of these Indians, notwithstanding the fact that we have been dissolving the tribal relations and allotting to them real estate, leads me to think it an eminently wise provision that we should in creating this State require that there shall be a positive prohibition against intoxicating liquors being furnished to them either by sale, by barter, gift, or otherwise. I do not think, Mr. President, that the Committee on Territories, who have brought this measure before us, need any defense as to this matter that they themselves can not make. I do not think anybody needs any defense for the making of a provision of that character. It is true these Indians, I suppose, are not in a wild state, but they are Indians still, although the tribal relations may be dissolved, and although we are proposing to make citizens of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say they are always wild when they are drunk.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not a peculiarity of the Indians.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it is more than of a white man.

Mr. BAILEY. White folk get as wild as Indians when they are drunk.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not quite.

Mr. FORAKER. Some white folk are liable to.

Mr. BAILEY. And some Indians, too.

Mr. FORAKER. But whether white folk do or not, we know the Indian is a pretty unsafe character when under the influence of intoxicating liquor. I think instead of the conferees being criticised they ought to be commended for that provision. I think it is wise.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not precisely a criticism against the Senate conferees, because that provision was in the House bill when it came to this body, and I intended to complain against the bill rather than against the Senate conferees.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I so understood the Senator from Texas, because I knew that the Senator knew what he has just said and also that the widening of the provision was made in the Senate and not in conference.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not know about that. I was only trying to employ language that would be broad enough to cover the Committee on Territories and the conferees and everybody else who was entitled to take credit for it, for I think it is a creditable provision to put in the bill.

I wish to say another word. I was opposed to the former conference report when it was brought in here some days ago because of its provisions with respect to New Mexico and Arizona. At the time when that conference report was brought in it was published all over the country in the newspapers, and particularly in my own State, that the conference report was based on what was known as the "Foraker amendment" of last year; that it had been adopted in precisely the same language, etc. And then followed, a day or two later, some very harsh criticisms of me, particularly in my own State, because I was not satisfied with that conference report and insisted upon something else. I was not satisfied with that, and I am not entirely satisfied with this, but I am so well satisfied with it that I intend to support it.

But the difference between the amendment of last year and the amendment of this year, which is the basis of this conference report, is a very wide difference. I can best make it plain by calling attention to what the bill was that we had before us last year in this particular. It provided, with respect to Arizona and New Mexico, that they should be joined together and admitted into the Union as one State. Then it provided that the governors of those two Territories should, within thirty days after the approval by the President of that enabling act, issue a proclamation ordering an election of delegates to a constitutional convention, to be held on the tenth Tuesday after the approval of the act, and until that date was given by the provisions of the act for the registration of voters and the making of the needful and proper preparations for the vote to be taken upon delegates to the constitutional convention. Then it provided that the convention might remain in session under pay for the term of sixty days in the work of framing the constitution; that they should not be required to meet until the fifth Monday after they had been elected, and that there should be a reasonable and proper time given for a vote to be taken upon the adoption of the constitution.

That was amended by the adoption of an amendment which I offered, so as to insert in the provision as to the vote on the constitution that there should be a majority in favor of the constitution in each of said Territories. That amendment was offered without as careful consideration as should have preceded it. When the matter came up this year there had been more time for consideration, and instead of offering that amendment, I offered the amendment of this year, which provided that there should be, as a first step in determining whether or not there should be joint statehood, an election at which every qualified elector in the Territories should have a right to vote directly on the question of joint statehood—for it or against it. The provisions in other respects were very similar to those of the preceding year.

When the conference report of a few days ago was brought in it provided that within twenty days, instead of within thirty days, after the act should be approved by the President the governors of those two Territories should issue their proclamations calling upon the proper officials to make registration lists of all the qualified voters in the two Territories. This registration was to be completed within thirty days. The election of delegates to the constitutional convention was to be held almost immediately afterwards, on the fifth Tuesday after the act was approved by the President. The delegates so elected were immediately to meet in Santa Fe, and they were within thirty days thereafter to frame and submit a constitution.

It seemed to me, in other words, without specifying further, that there was an undue hastening of the procedure all along the line, and then, what was more objectionable still, was the fact that it provided that there should not be any vote directly on the question of joint statehood, but only a vote on the question of adopting the constitution, and if there should be a failure of a majority in either Territory upon the question of adopting the constitution statehood should be defeated, but not otherwise. That amendment, for the reasons I have indicated, was not satisfactory, but there was another reason still. I have contended all the while, as other Senators have; that if there was to be joint statehood of those two Territories, with the protests against it coming up to us which we have been receiving from Arizona, the people of those two Territories should not only be allowed to vote on the question, but if they were to be allowed to vote they should be allowed to vote before their representatives were required to meet together in joint convention and frame a constitution. They should not be required to frame a constitution until they knew whether or not they were going to need it. It seemed to me to be an illogical sort of an arrangement, with the feeling existing, with the opposition on the part of the people of Arizona, not to say on the part of a good many people living in New Mexico, according to my advices, to require them to meet and frame a constitution before they had determined that they needed one.

Therefore I was not satisfied with that report. I accept this report, Mr. President, because it gives thirty days after the passage of this act and the approval of it by the President for the issuance of the proclamations of the governors calling for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, and that election is to be held in November next, and then when the delegates assemble in convention, if they ever do, they are to be allowed sixty days—twice as much time as was given under the other report—in which to do the very important work of framing an organic law. The time will prove none too long, I imagine, judging by the experience we have had in our State in making constitutions. We have tried it two or three times, and we have never been able to finish in anything like that period.

Now, in addition to everything else, we save the expense of a special election, for the provision of this conference report is that the vote is to be taken on the question of joint statehood at the regular general election to be held in the Territory for the election of Territorial officers on the 6th day of next November. Everybody can be in attendance without any expense or any trouble, except only that which the people would go to anyhow to attend the regular election. At that election a ballot is to be furnished to each voter which will enable him to vote upon the direct question whether or not he wants joint statehood. Thus we get an expression upon this direct question. At the same election, under the provisions of the conference report, they can elect delegates to the constitutional convention, to take office, if there be in each Territory a majority vote in favor of joint statehood, and frame a constitution. Otherwise the election to go for naught.

It seems to me that, under all the circumstances, this is a fair and just adjustment of the controversy, and I hope the conference report will be adopted.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, being a member of the Committee on Territories and a minority member of the committee of conference, in view of what seems very much like criticism upon the result of the labors of the conference committee, I think I should not permit this matter to close without saying a few words.

To be sure, a minority member of a committee of conference such as this is not a very enviable position. A minority member is soon given to realize that he is a sort of vermiform appendix. He has no particular function to perform, except to irritate the body of which he is a part. I sometimes think that a surgical operation might as well be performed to eliminate minority members of committees of this kind.

In what may be termed the unimportant features of the bill, although every feature is necessarily important to the Territories concerned, the minority members had their say. But when the real statehood question was reached—the details of the submission of the question of joint statehood for New Mexico and Arizona—we were called in only after the work was done and the fiat of the majority was ready to be proclaimed. To a certain extent we have given enforced acquiescence to it. But to the main propositions contained in the measure we gave most cheerful and hearty acquiescence. To that part of the report which will make certain the statehood of Oklahoma within a reasonable time the minority members of the conference are in most hearty accord. To that part which prohibits joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico until there shall be an election held under reasonably favorable circumstances we also give our hearty accord. So as to these features of the conference report I am inclined to think the minority members give more hearty support to the report than do the majority members.

But, Mr. President, with reference to joint statehood for Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, I do not regard that as a hardship at all. It is simply the reuniting of parts, united originally, that I believe were intended to be reunited in statehood. Oklahoma was carved out of the Indian Territory, and in the bill creating that Territory it was provided that as rapidly as the tribes left in the Indian Territory ended their tribal relations the land they occupied might be added from time to time to the Territory of Oklahoma. So I am inclined to think, if we can gather information from legislation of years ago, that it was the anticipation of Congress when Oklahoma became a State the Indian Territory would be united with it—that is, if by the time Oklahoma became a State the tribal relations of the Five Civilized Tribes had ceased and the Indians had become citizens of the United States.

Then again, Mr. President, the joint Territories of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory make a State much less in size than any State which has been admitted into the Union for thirty-five years—hardly half the size of Colorado, not a fifth the size of what would be the State of Arizona if New Mexico and Arizona should be admitted as one State. In addition to the smallness of the area, the information I received from both Territories is that their white population were quite willing, and the great bulk of it were extremely anxious, that their anomalous condition should be ended and that both Territories should be united in one State.

Therefore, Mr. President, I acquiesce with great cheerfulness in the part of the report that makes one State out of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, and I am inclined to think that I speak for the great majority of the Senators upon this side of the Chamber when I say that they also acquiesce in that part of the report. We have all stood for either the admission of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory as two States or for the admission of both Territories as a single State. Our labors and desires and influence have been from the very first in behalf of the admission of both either as separate States or as a single State. Accepting the logic of the situation, I think I can safely say we are on this side of the Chamber now an harmonious whole for the reception of the new State of Oklahoma as is provided in the conference report and in the bill that passed the Territorial Committee of the Senate.

Mr. President, as to Arizona and New Mexico there is no doubt that every member on this side of the Chamber, with one possible exception, has been from the first in favor of the admission of each as a State in the Union. We have believed from the time this discussion commenced that each had the area, the population, the wealth, and the civilization that are necessary to make each of them a State of which the entire country might well be proud; and therefore almost as a united body we have stood contending here and before the country for the admission of each of them as separate States.

I have been particularly impelled to this by reason of the provision creating Arizona a Territory, for therein it was most solemnly provided that the government of Arizona should continue until the people of that Territory applied to Congress for admission as a State. I regarded the joint-statehood proposition for these Territories as an open and almost inexcusable violation of an obligation that was imposed upon all succeeding Congresses by the Congress that created Arizona Territory, and that it should not be ignored. For that reason we fought to the last ditch, it may be said, in opposition to everything that was intended to forcibly unite them.

To the first conference report, I think, this side of the Chamber was opposed as a body, because it did not submit to the people of each Territory, fairly and squarely and without duress, the proposition of joint or single statehood. In any event, Mr. President, without going into details, as did the Senator from Ohio, no Senator could read the provisions of that report without recognizing that there was no fair time given for registration or for the formation of a constitution or for a proper understanding of a constitution before everything would have to be voted upon next November.

In addition to that, by reason of the peculiar language of the law providing for registration, it was clear to me that upon the final vote upon both the constitution and for officers at least one-half of the legally qualified voters of Arizona would be disfranchised.

But, Mr. President, so far as the provisions of the present conference report go, they, I believe, secure to the people of both New Mexico and Arizona as fair an opportunity as could have been expected for the voters of each to express their desires upon the question of joint statehood. There is nothing that will interfere with a full and free expression of the views of each of those Territories except the fear, which must always be present, that unless they do accept joint statehood they may be kept out of the Union for a great many years to come.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe that such will be the case. If the result of the submission of this question to the voters of the two Territories shall be such, as both sides of this question anticipate, if we may judge of their anticipation by their statements, joint statehood will be overwhelmingly defeated not only in Arizona, but in New Mexico. One good result of the submission of this question to the voters of Arizona, if such shall be the result of the election, will be that neither the Senate nor House will have the hardihood to again attempt to coerce the people of these two Territories into a joint relation that neither desire and that both at heart abhor.

I have no question, Mr. President, but that when the next Congress meets, if the result of the vote shall be such as is predicted, bills for the admission of these two Territories, each to be a separate State, will be introduced and will be passed with little or no controversy.

Mr. President, like the Senator from Texas, I stand here now in behalf of the people of the country to welcome the new State of Oklahoma into the Union of States, and I believe that before another Congress has expired we will be able to welcome the people of New Mexico and Arizona into the Union as inhabitants of two separate, distinct, great, and independent Commonwealths.

Mr. FORAKER obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me just a moment to correct a mistake I made when I was on my feet a moment ago?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. STONE. I would yield to the Senator from Ohio anyhow.

Mr. FORAKER. When on the floor a moment ago, replying to the Senator from Texas about the provision as to prohibition in Indian Territory, I made the mistake of picking up the wrong bill. When I came to read the provision I read from the bill of last year. The provision this year is in legal effect, generally speaking, practically the same, but it is much longer and goes much more into details. I ask simply that it may be incorporated in the RECORD without stopping to read it.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that it be read.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest that the Senator will have the right to print it where he read the other provision.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I think it would be better to go in just as it is, because the remarks I made with respect to the other might not exactly fit this provision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio to insert in the RECORD the provision he has sent to the desk?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I ask that the matter which has been pointed out by the Senator from Ohio, and which he asks to be inserted in the RECORD, may be read.

I wish to make a remark in this connection, Mr. President. Not having been on the conference committee, I shall have to give the excuse to my constituents that I do not know what it is, and I find that the Senator from Ohio did not know what it was.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will allow me to say to him that I think that is hardly called for. I was speaking of the general provision, and when I came to read it, having both bills on my table, I by mistake picked up the wrong copy.

Mr. MORGAN. That was very natural, because our tables have been covered with different editions of this measure from day to day. We do not know what is in this bill, and there is not a Senator on this floor to-day, unless he is a member of the conference committee, who can get up and tell the Senate what are the provisions of the bill.

I wanted to suggest that, inasmuch as this is a great matter and inasmuch as under the prediction of the Senator from Texas it is to be the last vote we shall ever take, probably, upon the question of statehood, the Senate of the United States can be indulged in time enough to have this bill printed as it comes from the conference committee.

Mr. KEAN. It has been printed.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not mean merely the report, but the bill with the amendments properly printed in the text, as the rate bill was printed as it came from the conference committee, so that we can be allowed to take it up with some composure and with some idea of what it contains, and pass upon it as becomes gentlemen who are dealing with the highest function of Senatorial power in the United States.

Mr. STONE rose.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Missouri excuse me just a minute?

Mr. STONE. With pleasure.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, if we were here making a declaration of war concurrently with the House, I suppose great solemnity and great care would characterize every word that was said and every vote that was given, the reason of that being that we could not share the responsibility of a declaration of war with the President of the United States. The two Houses have the exclusive control of the question of a declaration of war.

Equally so, Mr. President, is it in regard to the admission of a State into the Union. The President of the United States, if you pass this bill, has no right to veto it. The President of the United States, except for some provisions that are unwise and unnecessary, would have no right to consider it. If the Senate of the United States and the House before midnight of this day should vote a concurrent resolution that the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Oklahoma, and the Indian Territory should be admitted into the American Union, with their respective boundaries, to be delayed only until Congress should examine the question whether the constitution that they would adopt was republican in form, those States would be in the Union, and no power in this Union could turn them out or question the legitimacy of their situation in the Union. The Senate and the House by concurrent action can provide for every condition that is requisite to the admission of a State into the Union without referring the subject to the President of the United States at all. It is a separate function.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I note with much interest the remark made by the Senator, as I understand him, that it is not necessary for the President to approve an enabling act which we are proceeding to pass. I suppose the Senator bases that upon the language of the Constitution which says that the Congress may admit new States to the Union; but I will ask the Senator if it be not true that every enabling act under which a Territory has been admitted to the Union has been approved by the President?

Mr. MORGAN. No; not every one; but the great majority of them have. I concede that.

Mr. FORAKER. I supposed they all had been approved by the President.

Mr. MORGAN. I concede that; but I am not here for the purpose of following an unconstitutional precedent, if I so regard it. I am sworn to support that instrument as I understand it; and therefore it is not my duty to follow precedents at all.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The proposition of the Senator, who is a very profound and learned lawyer, is to some of us novel. Is there any instance where an enabling act passed by Congress providing for the admission of a new State has not been approved by the President?

Mr. MORGAN. The Congress have invited the President to come into their counsels and participate with them in legislation appropriate to or connected with the admission of a new State. But California is a State in this Union. What enabling act did she have?

Mr. HALE. How has Congress invited the President in enabling acts and bills of this kind in any different way from what it does when Congress passes any bill without making any reference to the President and the President receives it and either approves it or vetoes it? I am not aware, in what knowledge I have of legislation on this subject, that an enabling act has in any way differed from other bills passed by Congress; but it has, without any invitation by Congress, been taken up by the President and received his sanction. The Senator may be entirely right, but, as I began by saying, it is a very novel proposition to some of us.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is novel to gentlemen who do not pay enough attention or care enough for the opinion of their colleagues on this floor to read what they have said. In the discussion of this measure a year ago or a little more—I do not know just when it was—I put myself to the trouble of making an elaborate argument upon this very proposition, and brought in the authorites and all that. Of course that all went for nothing. It did not even draw the attention of Senators. I am not complaining of it. That is something I have the right to expect, and almost every gentleman on this side of the Chamber has a right to expect the same thing in regard to anything he may propose in this body. I do not complain of it. I do not, however, rest under the impeachment of having sprung a new idea on the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I listened to it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Wisconsin is generally very attentive to all that takes place in this Chamber, no matter who is on the floor.

I brought that up, Mr. President, with a view to illustrate what we are doing here. I am merely speaking of the power of the Senate and the House, not as legislative bodies, not by the enactment of a law, but by the passage of a concurrent resolution, just as we declare war, to admit a State into the American Union.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I think in the remarks made by the Senator to which he has referred he very clearly demonstrated that Congress could admit a State without consulting the Executive. If a State had been formed, as in the case of California, without any enabling act and Senators and Representatives elected, Congress could recognize such Senators and Representatives, and they would become a part of the legislative bodies and the State a part of the Union. But in the bill here presented, I submit to the Senator, the concurrence of the Executive is necessary, not because it is necessary to the admission of a State, but because certain appropriations are made and certain grants included in this bill require Executive approval.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Grants of land.

Mr. CARTER. Grants of land in great quantity.

Mr. MORGAN. The appropriation that may be made for carrying into effect the joint action of the two Houses can as well be made upon the predicate of a concurrent resolution as upon the predicate of a bill that contains the appropriation itself. So that question answers itself. As to the proposition that a State may be admitted even if it has been formed, that answers itself, because a State can not be formed until it is admitted. It may be formulated, but it can not be formed. It can be stated as a proposition and submitted to the two Houses of Congress for their acceptance, and they may accept it, as they did in the case of California and in the case of Texas; but it is not a State that is formed. It is a proposition from a certain political entity or unit that they propose to form a State with our consent. When we give our consent upon the terms that have been stated, the State is formed; and when it is formed in that way there is no power in the Union that can put it out or disregard its rights.

I do not expect, Mr. President, to advance that proposition in opposition to this measure. Congress, in obeying the precedents that sometimes have obtained, has invited the President of the United States to participate in this "act of legislation," as we term it, which is for the admission of a State, and also for certain appropriations and certain regulations in regard to boundaries and the public lands, etc., that it is very proper the President should participate in.

But, Mr. President, if Arizona and New Mexico should vote in favor of statehood, an election is to determine that fact and returns are to be made from that election. That is an event in the future which determines the right of these two States to joint statehood. So far as separate statehood is concerned, that is not provided for in the case of Arizona and New Mexico. If Arizona and New Mexico or either of them refuse to be consolidated with the other that State passes back into its Territorial condition, and that is the end of it. That is as much as if the law was repealed. It has the same effect as if the law was abrogated or repealed. So that vote has either the effect of repealing, abrogating, and annulling this act, so far as those two Territories are concerned, or it has the effect of bringing them into the Union as one State.

How is Congress going to determine about that election? Who is to have the final act of determination upon that subject? The President of the United States? You might just as well say the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, because they are both equally outsiders from the question of fact as to whether the State has been admitted into the Union by that vote. Whether it comes into the Union by that vote or not depends upon how you count it, how it is reported. There is no confirmation of it on the part of any person in this bill at all, except the President of the United States. The reports are to be made to him, if I read the bill correctly, or remember it correctly, and he is to detemine whether or not these two States, or either of them, have voted that they will not consolidate or both of them have voted that they will consolidate. Here are all the incidents of a popular election to be settled and determined, first, by the returning board, and, secondly, by the President of the United States.

Suppose the returning board returns that the two States have agreed to unite. The President of the United States says, "Well, I am not satisfied with that. Here are accusations about bribery in elections and the like of that. I am not satisfied that you had a fair election; I will not approve it, and I will not issue my proclamation." Then nothing is done, and the alleged falsity of the returns of the returning board annuls all that Congress is doing here to-day.

That is not the admission of a State into the American Union under the Constitution. That is the mere pivotal fact that is put up in this case upon which turns the question of the admission of one sovereign State composed of two Territories; and that fact is not to be determined by the Senate or by Congress. We delegate the power to determine that fact to a third party; and I do not care whether it is the President of the United States or the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the delegation in both cases is equally void.

The act of admission must be the act of these two Houses, and not the act of somebody else, who shall decide whether the law or the concurrent resolution enacted here has been complied with. The act of admission must be the act of the two Houses. Under this bill the act of admission will not be the act of the two Houses. It will be the act of a returning board, approved or disapproved by the President.

Now, if you intend to bargain this subject away by a contract between four or five Senators on this floor, why have you not provided that that election shall be brought back here and tested by some measure that the two Houses might inaugurate for the purpose of ascertaining its fairness, its honesty, and its justice?

Mr. President, I have no more expectation of seeing an honest election come out of New Mexico and Arizona under the bribe we offer them to unite into statehood than I would to have sweet odors come out of the butchering houses in Chicago. You offer them $5,000,000, paid out of the Treasury to their school fund. Who pays that money? My constituents have to be taxed to pay their part of it. The Treasury of the United States must be unlocked and $5,000,000 voted out there. "If you vote for joint statehood, you will get this money. If you do not vote for joint statehood, you will not get it." Under the pressure of that single bribe, for it is nothing else, upon the mind of the voters of these Territories, we know what the result is going to be. We know it now. When the returns come in they will be that "We accept the money and vote for joint statehood." That will be the return. I do not want the Senate of the United States, by any sort of contrivance, and particularly by an arrangement made by a few Senators, to tax my people to make their contribution to that pile of gold. It was intended for nothing else in the world but to induce men to vote for joint statehood.

Who are the people who are going to vote? They are the people qualified, so far as I remember the bill, according to the laws of New Mexico and the laws of Arizona; and when we come to those qualifications there is a great mix up in regard to Indians who are taxed and Indians who are not taxed. Many Indians, I am informed by the testimony that has heretofore been given before this committee, have declined to vote, although they would have been permitted, because by declining to vote they have escaped taxation.

We draw a classification between Indians. We examine into that in Oklahoma; we hold an election there also; and all the Indians who are American citizens and who are males of 21 years of age are permitted to vote, and all the negroes who are American citizens and who are males of 21 years of age are entitled to vote; and they vote for the constitution, for these organic laws, as to which we ourselves frequently find we are entangled and engulfed in doubt and difficulty in trying to interpret. These are the men to whom we commit the destiny of a State, the fixing of the provisions of the constitution.

Then the reformers have got in there—the reformers on the subject of the prohibition of the sale of liquor. They have invaded that Territory. Then the reformers on the religion of the Mormons have invaded that Territory. Those reformers are hard at work, and they have made their work tell upon this bill. I notice in the conference report, which was printed and for the first time was in the hands of Senators this morning of this very busy, hard-worked, overworked day, that the prohibition in regard to the Territories of Arizona and Mexico is as follows:

> First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured—

Not saying anything about Mormonism; of course that is not religious sentiment—> and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; and that polygamous or plural marriages and the sale, barter, or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians are forever prohibited.

To whom? To Indians. These men who have been voting for the constitution; these men who are American citizens, and because they happen to be men of Indian blood—and a man is an Indian if he is a quadroon or an octoroon with Indian blood—you must never sell any liquor to them.

In Oklahoma and in the Indian Territory the negroes, who were formerly the slaves of these very Indians, are permitted to buy all the liquor they want, but the reformer seems to have gone blind on one side of his vision, and while he is trying to reform and to make that country temperate by constitutional law, he neglects the very worst man in the world in respect of his desire for drink and his uncontrollability when he is drunk, and that is the negro.

That is a beautiful specimen of statehood for this Senate to lay before the world and all the coming generations. Gentlemen are so eager to get the advantage, whether political or not, of this situation that they pass upon questions like this without giving them the slightest heed.

You must not sell any liquor to an Indian. Although it may be found in a medicine, the sale of it or the gift of it to an Indian is absolutely prohibited. Under this constitution a doctor can not administer it to him. It is absolutely prohibited in the fundamental and organic law. If his body servant—the fellow he used to own—happens, under the law, to be a negro, he can give him all he wants.

Mr. President, that shows the folly, as well as the hypocrisy, of these half-handed measures of reformation that we put into the organic laws of the States we admit into the Union.

What State, I will ask, of the American Union was ever degraded before by the Congress of the United States by saying, "There is a class of your citizens to whom you shall not sell whisky nor give it to them?" Have we not got the right, if we can pass this law, to say that no man who is a Republican shall be allowed to drink or handle or sell liquor or be indulged in the sale of it to anybody? Of course, if he should be a Democrat, we would do it without the slightest hesitation; but I am talking about the sainted party of Republicans, who find so much of benefaction and beauty and glory in instilling their fundamental convictions, but not their practices, into the constitutions of States. I am appealing to them, because they stand above temptation. It is not to be expeced that anybody would ever think about enacting a law to make a State pass a law to prohibit the sale of liquor to a Republican, but, owing to their manifest infirmities, it might be a subject of consideration when we come to applying it to a Democrat. Mr. President, I want the opportunity to read this bill before I vote upon it.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has been charged with having given a political complexion to this bill. If the Senator from Mississippi did a thing of that sort, it was because he could not fail to recognize the complexion that has been given to the bill, and his recognition of it certainly does not make him in any sense reprehensible. He had the right to see a thing when it was spread out before him, and he, seeing it, alluded to it. That is all.

The object of this bill, Mr. President, and the object of this legislation from the time it first took its origin in the caucus of the Republican party in the House of Representatives and was brought in there, and no amendment to it was permitted, and but a limited time was allowed for speaking about it—very limited, a couple of hours or something like that—from the time that this measure which we are considering had its origin in the House of Representatives it was a Republican measure, handled, shaped, and treated exclusively by a Republican caucus. It has never lost that tone. That tone has adhered to it all the time, and it is as much political to-day as it was then.

I will tell you what I believe to be the effect if not the purpose of this bill. It affects the representation of the people of the United States in this body. There are two Senators here from each State in this Union. The splendid little State of Rhode Island and its more majestic and imperial neighbor, New York, are each represented here by two Senators. Both the Rhode Island Senators are here, I believe, but I do not think either of the New York Senators is here to-day to hear what I have to say about this measure.

Mr. President, so it runs throughout the Union. Every State in this Union has an equal suffrage in this body. When you admit a State, you add a suffrage to this body that is equal to that of any of the States that have already been admitted. We go down into the Territories that are open to us, where there are more southern people who shed their blood in winning New Mexico than there ever was of northern blood. As to these large populous areas which we are irrigating, and where we are making the desert bloom as the rose, out of taxation upon the people of the United States, you are bound to say to yourselves: "These vast and hitherto unproductive areas are showing a degree of power in agricultural production and making a vast exhibit of mining power which the brightest-minded man in the United States, even fifteen years ago, did not dare to anticipate; they are coming forward with all their great wealth and, of course, are attracting population"—not population merely, Mr. President, but the cream of the population of the United States in respect to genius, industry, and manhood, for the frontier populations that have settled up those western countries are superior man by man to the people they left behind them after they have had the trials of a few years' hard experience; they are amongst the wisest and best and noblest of the men over whom the American flag floats. They have proved it in peace and in war. They have proved it everywhere. We know that these Territories are coming forward with a vast population. We have seen Oklahoma and Indian Territory filled up with population until it is a very marvel of the multiplication of population. Great populations are filling up these great areas and they are entitled to have, according to population and area, considered together—not as it exists to-day, but as it necessarily will exist prospectively—they are entitled to have their representation on the floor of the Senate. Animated by this proposition, I was amongst the first of the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber to commence voting for the admission of Territories as States, beginning with the Territory of Washington, and helped to vote in six Territories as States north of Mason and Dixon's line from within nine to twelve months. I rejoiced to do it, because they deserved it. How spleadidly they have filled up all the expectations and prophecies of that period of time in the development of their population and their wealth, agriculture, and all that, and in the splendid men they have sent here to occupy these chairs in the Senate of the United States.

Why should there be a desire to cut down the representation of the same kind of area to which the same kind of people are flocking in the South? Why do you do it? I will impute no ungenerous or improper motives to you, gentlemen, but I see the day coming—and while I do not expect to live to see it consummated, and I hope I will not—I see the day coming when you will have a two-thirds majority trained to party support by party discipline of the same sort out of which this bill originated in the House of Representatives; and when some man who has been educated to liberty of speech and independence of thought gets up on this floor and speaks the truth, without beguiling it with falsehood or apology, if it is disagreeable to gentlemen on the other side—if such a man should get up on this floor and denounce the adoption of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution as an act in derogation of and an outrage upon decent people, you might say that man's utterances were treasonable—treasonable as being connected with some church affair, perhaps, but far more treasonable in being connected with the Constitution of the United States and our history. You will have two-thirds majority, and all you will have to do will be to say to such a man as that: "You have avowed yourself as being in favor of a treasonable conspiracy under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. Take your walking papers and leave this Chamber." Do you want the power to inflict that upon us? Do you want to see the just and fair and proper equilibrium of the Government of the United States, this grand and magnificent Republic of forty-five sovereign States, so disturbed that one political party has the absolute control of a two-thirds majority, passing upon the credentials and the rights to the seats of the gentlemen who occupy this side of the Chamber? You may not want it, you may not anticipate it; but I dare say some day some of you will vote for such a thing. I will not impute it to the body of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber as the prevailing sentiment; but when you have got the power to do it, I confess to you I dread you. You will do those things that we see are being done every day here, when Senators get up and avow their adhesion to certain principles of government on the most solemn occasion, and win our approbation and get us to stand by them and go with them; but when it suits their personal or political views or convenience, or when they get tired of their patriotic duties, they walk off and make an agreement about it, put it in here in the morning in the form of a report that I can not read and I can not understand, and even refuse to have it printed, that we may look it over and point out our objections to it.

I thought that the provision in regard to the prohibition of liquor was the same for the Indian Territory and Oklahoma as it was for Arizona and New Mexico, but I find that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] having fallen into the same error, has corrected himself and they are quite different. I do not know, Mr. President, why it is that different provisions are made in two sections of the same bill providing for the admission of States to the American Union, one applying to Oklahoma and the Indian Territory and the other applying to Arizona and New Mexico. It disturbs me. I can not account for it. I do not know any reason why it should be so. Even if the humblest Senator on this floor, the least influential or the least respected of all this body, should say he desires some explanation of this difference in regard to the conditions upon which these Territories are to be admitted, the effect of their admission, and what provisions they are to put into their constitutional law, some wiser, abler, or more powerful man of this body, who had charge of this business, who had been working it through all its great ramifications backward and forward here, should get up and explain the reason of this inconsistency in the bill.

Does the other side of the Senate want to be accused by posterity of having put into the same law inconsistent provisions that are to go into the constitution of the State of Oklahoma and the constitution of the State of Arizona, if Arizona and New Mexico should vote to come in as one State? Do you want the schoolmasters and the school children, when reading and trying to interpret the constitution and laws of the United States and the history of the States in which they may be brought up, to be asking each other what was the reason for this difference? There was some reason for it; it could not have been simply the neglect of proper attention to the subject because of the pressure of time. The people of the United States give us all the time and all the money we need for staying here and attending to our business in a correct way; and yet we spring a bill before them, one relating to the southern part, the Territory of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, and the other relating to the northern and western part, New Mexico and Arizona, and when we come to the provisions that are to be put into the constitution of each we find them varying.

That is not creditable legislation; that is not legislation that the Senate of the United States ought to place its imprimatur upon; that is not the sort of legislation that would have been enacted by this body thirty years ago, when I first took my seat in it. There were men here then who would not have tolerated any such culpable neglect in the formation of a bill. But haste, bargaining, arrangement, contract—these things take the Senate and House by storm and run us into confirmation of laws here which, on their face, are censurable.

We hasten off to invite the President of the United States to proclaim the final acts upon which this statehood is to take place; and he bases his proclamation upon the statements made by returning officers, whom, he may think, are corrupt or incorruptible, just as he pleases, and adopt them or turn them aside. All this work that we are doing here to-day still hinges upon the remote and distant possibility or probability of how that election may turn. How it may go and how it may be counted, we do not know.

Senators have ventured to predict in their optimism about the effects of this bill as a healing act; they have ventured to predict that everything will turn out well and that the people of the United States will have occasion to be proud of this transaction when they get through with it. Mr. President, I do not indulge in that happy anticipation. That election will go for joint statehood in these two Territories. If the pile of money, the $5,000,000 that we put up there, does not affect it and influence it, there will be men in both of these Territories bargaining for seats in Congress and for Federal judgeships and for seats in the Senate who will see to it that the poor, illiterate creatures, the Indians themselves, who are permitted to vote there, will be hauled up to the polls and voted, or, if not voted, they will be counted. We will have a repetition here in a small way, but scarcely less tragic way, of those events that attended the condition of the Government at the very moment I first had the honor of being admitted to a seat in this body, when a great commission sat in the Supreme Court room to determine upon the fraudulency of a Presidential election and election returns. We will have the same thing repeated, except that we have made no provision for calling that election before ourselves.

If the President issues his proclamation, that ends it; these Territories are States; and no man would have the hardihood then to rise here and attempt to exclude one of these States, admitted into the Union by the President's proclamation, on the grounds that that proclamation was not justified by the proof. No man would have the hardihood to do that. We are casting the whole destiny of these people and their representation on this floor upon the die as to how it will turn upon the gambler's board, whether they shall be in favor of joint statehood or against it.

I have said more than I expected to say, and I do not expect to ever again address myself to this Senate upon this question. So far as the Indians are concerned in one way or another, we have worked them on this continent—I will not say unjustly or unmercifully or uncharitably—but in our conflicts with them, which have lasted for more than two centuries, we have now got to the last educated tribes in this country. Not only are they educated tribes, but they are self-educated tribes and tribes that have organized self-government within their own borders. They have had their legislatures, their supreme courts, their circuit and chancery and probate courts, have printed their reports in the English tongue, and have printed them also in that wonderful language of Sequoyah, whom I happened to know when I was a little bit of a boy.

I have known these people. I know them yet. I know Indians now, Creeks and Cherokees, lawyers of great capacity and talent, who are utterly ignored as Indians; yet they are proud of their position as such, and would be very glad indeed to bring up the remnant that is left of their tribes into the civilization which has made them so conspicuous. I will mention Porter as one of them whom I happen to know.

Mr. President, this is the last sod that is to be put on the political coffin of these people. They are not to have any more participation in the government of the State in which they live than the negroes they used to own. They lament it; they deplore it. They refer us back to treaty after treaty which pledges us not to serve them in this way; to act after act of Congress which pledges us never to incorporate them with any other State or any other Territory; that if they are to have Territorial government it shall be an Indian government. Often and over we have made these pledges. Many eloquent and wise remarks have been made in this Chamber by men who have passed away to honor and to glory in defense of the propositions contained in the treaty. And here we are, Democrats as well as Republicans, shoveling them into a coffin and burying them out of sight forever.

I can not feel justified in taking such action, not for the Indians, but for ourselves, under the promises that were made to the Indians by the men who preceded us. But this ends them. This is the close of their career. They were taken and really forced into citizenship and into the dissolution of their tribal government by the laws of the United States, and had American citizenship thus forced upon them, and then because they became American citizens we take and treat them just as well as we would the negroes who were made American citizens by the fourteenth amendment, and in that way, entirely by Congressional pressure, protested against at every move we made, these men have come to their last stand, and I, as an American Senator, simply bid them good-by. That is all I can do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama still desire to have read the portion of the bill sent to the Secretary's desk by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to have it read, so that the Senate may hear it, unless the Senate will consent to print the bill as it will appear under the conference report.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not object to its being read. I asked that it might be inserted in the RECORD without reading only to save time.

Mr. MORGAN. I knew what the purpose was.

Mr. FORAKER. The general purport——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It has been printed.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to see it before I vote on it, if I may have the opportunity.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to say to the Senator that this bill has already been printed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I will withdraw the demand in deference to the request of my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I do not know why, but still I do it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the portion of the bill requested to be inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Ohio will be published without reading.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Second. That the manufacture, sale, barter, giving away, or otherwise furnishing, except as hereinafter provided, of intoxicating liquors within those parts of said State now known as the Indian Territory and the Osage Indian Reservation and within any other parts of said State which existed as Indian reservations on the 1st day of January, 1906, is prohibited for a period of twenty-one years from the date of the admission of said State into the Union, and thereafter until the people of said State shall otherwise provide by amendment of said constitution and proper State legislation. Any person, individual or corporate, who shall manufacture, sell, barter, give away, or otherwise furnish any intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, and wine, contrary to the provisions of this section, or who shall, within the above-described portions of said State, advertise for sale or solicit the purchase of any such liquors, or who shall ship or in any way convey such liquors from other parts of said State into the portions hereinbefore described, shall be punished, on conviction thereof, by fine not less than $50 and by imprisonment not less than thirty days for each offense: Provided, That the legislature may provide by law for one agency under the supervision of said State in each incorporated town of not less than 2,000 population in the portions of said State hereinbefore described; and if there be no incorporated town of 2,000 population in any county in said portions of said State, such county shall be entitled to have one such agency, for the sale of such liquors for medicinal purposes; and for the sale, for industrial purposes, of alcohol which shall have been denaturized by some process approved by the United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and for the sale of alcohol for scientific purposes to such scientific institutions, universities, and colleges as are authorized to procure the same free of tax under the laws of the United States; and for the sale of such liquors to any apothecary who shall have executed an approved bond, in a sum not less than $1,000, conditioned that none of such liquors shall be used or disposed of for any purpose other than in the compounding of prescriptions or other medicines, the sale of which would not subject him to the payment of the special tax required of liquor dealers by the United States, and the payment of such special tax by any person within the parts of said State hereinabove defined shall constitute prima facie evidence of his intention to violate the provisions of this section. No sale shall be made except upon the sworn statement of the applicant in writing setting forth the purpose for which the liquor is to be used, and no sale shall be made for medicinal purposes except sales to apothecaries as hereinabove provided unless such statement shall be accompanied by a bona fide prescription signed by a regular practicing physician, which prescription shall not be filled more than once. Each sale shall be duly registered, and the register thereof, together with the affidavits and prescriptions pertaining thereto, shall be open to inspection by any officer or citizen of said State at all times during business hours. Any person who shall knowingly make a false affidavit for the purpose aforesaid shall be deemed guilty of perjury. Any physician who shall prescribe any such liquor, except for treatment of disease which after his own personal diagnosis he shall deem to require such treatment, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for each offense by fine of not less than $200 or by imprisonment for not less than thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and any person connected with any such agency who shall be convicted of making any sale or other disposition of liquor contrary to these provisions shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than one year and one day. Upon the admission of said State into the Union these provisions shall be immediately enforceable in the courts of said State.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not rise to address the Senate on this question, but to elicit information from the Senator in charge of the bill, if he can furnish it, as I suppose he can, in relation to the Osage Reservation. I know that the Osage Indians reside on that reservation. Does the Senator know and can he inform the Senate whether there are whites residing there; and if so, how many, and whether they have the rights of citizenship on that reservation?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], when the bill was before the committee and also in conference, had the question of the Osages particularly in charge, and one day here he made a very exhaustive statement containing all the statistics about which the Senator from Missouri now inquires. My own recollection, which is very vague and indefinite compared with the accurate information which the Senator from Vermont is able to give, is that there are perhaps half as many whites as Indians. I think there are some four or five thousand Indians.

But the Senator from Vermont during the pendency of this bill before the committee in the first place had that matter very particularly in charge, and on a former occasion made a statement in the Senate containing all the data and statistics with reference to it. That is my own vague recollection.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from Vermont will do me the kindness, I should like to ask how many whites reside on the reservation and what their right of residence there is.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the Senator from Indiana is somewhat incorrect in stating the extent of my information. I do not now recall the exact number of Indians residing there, nor do I recall the exact number of whites. My general recollection is that the whites are about one-half of the number of Indians. I understand that all the land in that reservation is held by the tribe; that they have title to it; that it has not been allotted; and that while several town sites have been laid out, the whites who are residents there have not become landowners, and in fact could not, under the present provision.

Mr. STONE. My understanding has been that the whites residing on this reservation were temporarily there because of leases that have been made with the Osage tribe with respect to oil and gas lands which are being operated; that there is no permanency to their residence; and that really they have only a mere right of occupancy for the purpose of developing these oil wells and gas wells. I think that information is reliable and correct, and if it is I am puzzled to understand why the Osage Indians, who are the only people, or practically the only people, who live permanently on this reservation, and who are entitled to be there, except those who are there temporarily, should be given a delegate in the constitutional convention. Under the bill the Indian Territory is given——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. I think under the provisions of the last conference report, which we are now considering, they are given not only one delegate, but they are given two.

Mr. STONE. I think one, under the report we are considering.

Mr. LONG. Under the first conference report they were given one; under this one I am sure they are given two.

Mr. STONE. As the bill came from the House it gave two, and it was amended in the Senate and reduced to one.

Mr. LONG. But we have receded from that amendment in this conference report.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator states that to be true, I accept it.

Mr. LONG. If I am incorrect, I will ask to be corrected by the Senator from Vermont. I am assured——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. I am assured by the Senator from Indiana that that is correct.

Mr. STONE. Then I am still more puzzled, if possible, to understand why the Osage Indians should be given two delegates. The Indian Territory is awarded fifty-five delegates and Oklahoma fifty-five delegates. The Osage Reservation is allowed two delegates, the Senator from Kansas, under the last report, thereby giving to the representatives of the people in that reservation the balance of power in the constitutional convention which is to frame the organic law of the State.

Mr. President, the Osage Indians are not citizens of the United States. They were not of the Five Civilized Tribes. Their land has not been allotted. They are not clothed with citizenship. Moreover, the Osage Indians approach more nearly to the real blanket Indians, or certainly as near to the real blanket Indians as any other tribe in this country. It is proposed in this bill to give to these Indians, who are not citizens, the right to a representation which will exercise the balance of power in the convention or else give that representation to people who are temporarily on the reservation, by right of course, but temporarily, for the purpose of carrying on an industry that will cease in the not distant future.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. I do not state it with authority or on personal knowledge, but I have heard the fact stated that there were about 5,000 white people residing by authority on the Osage Reservation; that by virtue of lawful right town sites have been laid out within the Osage Reservation, and town lots have been sold within those town sites; that the town lots were purchased in legal form; that the titles are good; that business is being conducted within the towns by white men as well as by Indians.

I assume that the representation allowed in the constitutional convention contemplated the representation due these 5,000 white people. The Senator from Kansas is probably thoroughly well informed concerning the conditions there existing, and I have no doubt he can give the Senator from Missouri accurate information upon the points to which his questions are directed.

Mr. STONE. What I have said has been predicated on the belief and understanding that the white population there was small and, as I say, only temporarily residents of the reservation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I think the Senator hardly describes the condition when he says the white population there is temporary. They reside in the towns. They own the lots under laws that have been enacted. I am informed there are 5,000 white persons living in this reservation now in the towns alone. There are also white people living in the country, under leases approved by the Secretary of the Interior, in addition to the 5,000 living in the towns. There are about 1,800 Indians upon the reservation. Those having certain qualifications are entitled to vote for members of the constitutional convention and on the question of the ratification of the constitution.

So these two delegates that are provided for the Osage Reservation will represent not only the Indians, but also the white people who live in the towns and who live in the country in that reservation.

Mr. STONE. If it be true that there are 5,000 people resident on that reservation, with the right to be there, with their homes, my information is not correct. It is a matter of information, a matter of fact. The Senator from Kansas possibly is better informed about it than I am.

Mr. LONG. I will state the source of my information with regard to the population.

Mr. STONE. It is not worth the controversy.

Mr. LONG. It is the Delegate from Oklahoma.

Mr. STONE. I do not care to discuss the matter. I simply wanted the information. I accept that which has been given.

Before I sit down, Mr. President, I will say that I am very glad that this long controversy is about ended. I can but feel that a gross wrong is being done the people of the Indian Territory and of Oklahoma in compelling the union of the two Territories as one State. I will not attribute unworthy motives to those who have brought the pending legislation to this end. That it does inure to the sectional advantage of the smaller States of the East and unfairly lessens the just representation of the great Southwest, to my mind is beyond fair dispute. But the thing is done, and I am glad that the nearly 2,000,000 people of these Territories are at last to have the benefit of the blessings of a government of their own, are at last to be freed from the constant supervision and tutelage of departmental officers in Washington, a thousand miles or more away from them.

I do not share in the apprehension of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that the great sum to be given out of the Treasury to the school fund of the proposed State of Arizona and the enormous grant of land to that State will operate to bribe the voters of Arizona to accept this repugnant union sought to be forced upon them. There is no reason why the voters of Arizona should accept it; why they should wear this yoke unwillingly. If this proposition is voted down by either of the Territories, it will not come here again in that form. Arizona can be admitted as a separate State, as can New Mexico, and the same generosity is offered in this bill to the support of their schools. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] advises me that the two Territories are to vote jointly. I understand they are to vote separately, and that if either votes against the union, then the whole proposition is lost.

Mr. PETTUS. That used to be so.

Mr. STONE. That is in the conference report. I did not rise to discuss the subject, but to make an inquiry.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, unlike the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], I am not taking on an extra load of happiness or gratification because of the final settlement of this very vexed question and this long dispute, for the reason that I can not get a great deal of comfort out of the settlement of a controversy until that settlement is a right and not a wrong settlement.

Mr. President, I wish this evening very briefly to suggest to the Senate that I at least, as one who has opposed and, I believe, consistently opposed the uniting of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, can not agree to surrender the principle which I feel has been surrendered in this compromise movement. When I voted for the Foraker amendment some two or three years ago in this controversy, I voted for it not because I thought it was sound in principle that we should submit to any given Territory the question whether it should be joined to another and admitted, but because at that time, in order to prevent a greater wrong, the proposition of the Senator from Ohio was placed there as a kind of check against legislation which would, without it, probably have united the two Territories. I voted for it because of that and that only.

Now, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], who seems to father this compromise measure, appear to me to have surrendered the principle that was really at stake in that proposition. What was that? That no two Territories of themselves should dictate to Congress either whether they should come in jointly or come in together, nor should that question with them in the slightest degree affect us.

Mr. President, the question whether Arizona and New Mexico should come into the Union as a single State is not a question for those two Territories to decide. You might as well say that those two Territories should decide whether they should come in as four States instead of two States. It is for Congress to determine what Territories should be taken into the Union, and no people now living in any one section of the United States have a right by their vote to disfranchise any portion of the territory at present within the boundaries of the United States in their voice in the Senate of the United States fifty or one hundred years from to-day.

With the sparse settlements in those two Territories, with the great influence that will be brought to bear in those Territories by politicians who are spurred on with the hope of securing some political preference, I am not so certain that they will not be able to secure a vote in both of the Territories in favor of joint statehood. I hope that they will not. I know that if they were not influenced one way or the other they certainly would not vote in favor of any joint statehood. But what I insist upon is that Congress should not be bound by the vote of those two Territories if they desire to come in as one State any more than it should be bound by their preference in coming in as four States.

I do not entirely agree, Mr. President, with the sentiments that have been expressed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. The Senator from Mississippi seemed to think that this has been made a political question. As between the two older parties it certainly has not been made a political question. It was within the power of the Republican majority in this body to create two States, one of which would be certainly Republican, the other of which would have been certainly Democratic, and the one would offset the other, so far as political influence in the Senate was concerned. They have laid aside that view of it, and have by a majority voted for a State that will be absolutely Democratic as it comes in as a new State, and, in my opinion, the Senators who will come from that State will be Democratic Senators, because I believe that that is the sentiment of the entire Territory now united in one.

What influence, then, has been at work which has compelled the Senate to adopt a measure which is to take two Territories, either one of which would make a splendid State, and either one of which would be equal in area to the average State east of the Mississippi, and say that those must come in simply as one State? It is not the influence of the politics of parties so much as the influence of the politics of sections. It may be that there is no politics other than sectionalism in this matter.

Mr. President, there has never been a Territory yet admitted as a State that the admission was not influenced more or less by sectionalism, and probably there never will be one. How do I arrive at this? It is the theory of a number of the older States, those that are now settled, that their proportionate force in the Senate of the United States shall not be lessened. I think that is the guiding influence which has affected very many of us in the question that has been before us.

There has been another matter, too, strange as it may seem. A great many Senators have argued this case upon the ground that we did not want to admit a new State with a boundary line such as we will find in the Indian Territory, and thus the irregularity of boundary lines is made an influence more or less great in determining whether we shall have one State or two States in Indian Territory and Oklahoma. In other words, we have been making a map for the United States, rather than making States. It seems to be against our æsthetic taste that we should have any more States as irregular in outline as Florida or as West Virginia, and we want our map hereafter to look more like a checkerboard, as it will be more pleasing to the eye, without reference to these great sections.

Mr. President, I for one wish to vote against this measure for that reason. I believed several years ago, I continue in the belief, that the four Territories remaining west of the Mississippi River should be made four great States; first, because they have the area, and, second, so far as the Territory of Oklahoma is concerned, it has now the population, and in future will have a great deal more than the population for proper representation in both branches of Congress, and that should be the governing feature in the admission of any new Territories.

I am opposed to uniting these two Territories into one State for another reason. That vast section lying west of the Mississippi River, more than two-thirds of the territory of the United States, and in less than one hundred years, in my opinion, having two-thirds of the population of the United States, should have at that time a representation equal to the other third, because they will have both the territory and the population equal to the other third of the United States. In legislating on a subject of this kind we are not legislating for to-day, but we are legislating for fifty, a hundred, and a thousand years from to-day, and we ought to look to the future sufficiently to guard the interests of every section of the country, so that the representation should be as nearly equal as we could possibly make it. In this legislation we have not done so. In this legislation, as proposed by this amendment, we have surrendered the principle that Congress and not a section of the country is to determine whether it is fitted to come into the Union and with what boundary it should be taken as a State into the United States.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I believe that Oklahoma should be one State and Indian Territory another State; but inasmuch as the people of those Territories have expressed their willingness to be joined, I accept readily that part of the conference report.

I do not think that Arizona or New Mexico, singly or jointly, should be made a State at this time. I am very much opposed to that part of the conference agreement. I offered an amendment to the Arizona bill when it was pending, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

VI. No person shall be permitted to vote, serve as a juror, or hold any civil office who is under guardianship, idiotic, or insane, or who has, at any place, been convicted of treason, felony, embezzlement of the public funds, bartering or selling or offering to barter or sell his vote, or purchasing or offering to purchase the vote of another, or other infamous crime, and who has not been restored to the rights of citizenship, or who, at the time of such election, is confined in prison on conviction of a criminal offense; or who is a bigamist or polygamist, or is living in what is known as patriarchal, plural, or celestial marriage, or in violation of any law of this State or the United States forbidding any such crime, or who in any manner teaches, advises, counsels, aids, or encourages any person to enter into bigamy, polygamy, or such patriarchal, plural, or celestial marriage, or to live in violation of any such law, or to commit any such crime; or who is a member of or contributes to the support, aid, or encouragement of any order, organization, association, corporation, or society which teaches, advises, counsels, encourages, or aids any person to enter into bigamy, polygamy, or such patriarchal or plural marriage, or who teaches or advises that the laws of this State prescribing rules of civil conduct are not the supreme law of the State.

VII. The legislature may prescribe qualifications, limitations, and conditions for the right of suffrage additional to those prescribed in this article, but shall never annul any of the provisions in this article contained.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, that amendment was adopted by the unanimous vote of the Senate, without opposition by voice or vote, and I think it should have been retained in the bill. If this proposed new State comes into the Union, the hierarchy of the Mormon Church is already there. It has its nucleus, and this provision in the constitution would be a restraint upon its power, which is most powerful.

It is said that there are few Mormons in Arizona and New Mexico. Last year there were seventeen convictions of Mormons for unlawful cohabitation in Arizona and fifteen in New Mexico. That means that at least ninety-three persons were living in the polygamous relation in those Territories. I have myself seen in the office of the Attorney-General of the United States a long list of polygamists in those Territories. There are at least ten living in this relation in Idaho and Wyoming and Utah where there is one in Arizona or New Mexico. Yet you can not convict one of them in any of those States, because of the tremendous political power of this organization, and when you clothe these Territories with statehood, when the power of the United States is taken away, then comes the political power of this hierarchy, and no convictions will be had there for these crimes.

I have been engaged in this conflict with the Mormon hierarchy for twenty-five years—ever since 1881—with the exception of a few years after the issuance of the manifesto, when the Mormon Church proclaimed that they would cease their political dictation; that they would cease their polygamous living; and when, through pleas for amnesty, they reiterated these pledges to the Government. During that era I was led to believe that they were sincere. I accepted their statements, and hoped and said that the church had given up polygamy and polygamous living and had ceased to dominate its followers in political affairs. But soon after statehood came to Utah they resumed these practices, until now conditions are worse and more dangerous to our civilization than in the early days.

I know what this means to me full well. It means the end of my political career. I stated it plainly to my people in Idaho when I started this conflict again. When I announced my determination to put laws on the books to punish polygamous living and to separate the church from the state in politics, I knew and said in public speech that the power of this hierarchy would stop my political career.

I have never asked quarter from them, and I never have given any. I will say to the credit of the chiefs of this organization that they never made the charge against me that I ever sought their political aid. Twice I was elected to the other branch of Congress and twice to this. During all of those elections, popular or otherwise, I received but one Mormon vote. On my last election to the Senate a Mormon from my county voted for me, but he would not have done so if his vote could have beaten me.

I enjoy the life here; I enjoy the duties here; and I would have had a continued service had it not been for this conflict. If it were not for this treasonable and polygamous organization in Idaho, if there were no Mormons there, I would be elected Senator again, almost without opposition. They interrupted my career in 1896. I carried twenty-nine members of the legislature, who were pledged to me, out of thirty-six necessary to elect. I should have carried all of those in my own section of the country where the Mormons lived. That was in the era of good feeling, too. It took them a month to defeat me in the legislature, and they could not have done it then and would not have done it had it not been for this hierarchy, who controlled enough Mormons, and some who were not Mormons, to prevent my election.

I want to warn the Senate that they are playing with fire when they do not restrain in all proper ways this menace to our civilization. No man can be elected a Senator from Utah or Idaho or Wyoming who will oppose openly the practices of this hierarchy and this organization. Unless you are watchful and understand that Mormons are not Republicans or Democrats, and support no party or no principle except for the benefit of their organization and for the perpetuation of polygamy and the political power of their hierarchy, you will soon find that they are the balance of power in this great body.

I regret that the conferees did not put that amendment in this bill for the benefit of the American citizens there who soon, when statehood comes, will have to fight this fight.

I shall not vote for the conference report.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, just one moment. I think it fair and just to the Democrats, at least in the Senate, in view of what was said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], to say that no Senator on this side feels that in voting for this conference report he is voting to unite Oklahoma and Indian Territory against their will.

In the early stages of this controversy I was as earnestly in favor of the separate admission of those States as the Senator from Mississippi is or could ever have been. I insisted upon that course so long as there was a possible hope of its accomplishment. I voted to separate them and to admit each as a State into the Union, because I know, and I know it as a neighbor to both, that each possesses the wealth, the population, and the resources to qualify it to discharge all its duties as a Commonwealth of the American Union.

But when by an overwhelming majority the Senate and the House, each upon separate occasions, had voted against the proposition to admit these two Territories as separate States, I abandoned my hope, though I did not change my opinion. I believed then, I have believed throughout the controversy, I believe this afternoon, that they ought to be admitted as two States into the Union.

But, Mr. President, I know as well as I know that I am addressing the Senate this moment that their separate admission is not within the range of human probability. I know that when they are admitted they will be admitted as one State, and I know that a further resistance of their admission as one State is simply a resistance against their admission at all.

Therefore it seemed to me as their neighbor, acquainted with their condition, and with some knowledge of the difficulties under which they labor, that I would fail in my duty to them and I would fail in my duty to the Senate, if I persisted in advocating what will never be done and in resisting the only thing which will be done.

Mr. President, one word more. The Senator from Mississippi seemed to think that the prohibition part of this enabling act is mere brutum fulmen, and that it is without any force or effect. He would be right if this bill provided that no liquor should be given to the Indians at any time, and that no liquor should be sold within a given time throughout what is now the Indian Territory; but the gentlemen who drew that bill were wiser than to draw it in that way. They provide not that it is the law of Congress that no liquor shall be sold, but that before this new State is admitted into the Union it shall itself provide by constitutional enactment that no liquor shall be sold Therefore, if this provision should be attacked in the courts of the country, the people who attack it would not allege that Congress had no power to pass that law, for, if they did, the officers of the State would answer that they prosecuted, not under the law of Congress, but under the constitution of Oklahoma and under the laws made in pursuance of it.

I grant you that after Oklahoma once becomes a State, her people can amend their constitution, although the law of Congress under which they are admitted declares that that provision shall not be amendable. They can amend it, because, in my judgment, it is not competent for Congress to impose a continuing obligation like that upon a State. But when, in obedience to the requirement of Congress, the new State has made this provision a part of its constitution, it will be easier to live under the limitation than it would be to repeal it; and the sum of it all will be that for ten years this new State of Oklahoma will be living under a law imposed upon it by Congress, and not adopted by its free will.

Mr. President, I have no desire to engage with the Senator from Mississippi or any other Senator in an argument upon the prohibition question. I have never believed that this is the forum for that argument. If to-morrow a law of that kind should be proposed here, I would resist it, because it belongs to the States and not to the Federal Government. But while I earnestly believe in the rights of the States, I have yet to learn this new doctrine of the rights of the county. When the Senator from Mississippi insists that in supporting an amendment to the constitution of my State I was destroying the right of local self-government he carries that theory further than it is safe to carry it. I understand that, as a matter of policy, it is better to leave as many things to the local communities as possible, but I have not understood that the counties possess rights against the State the same as the State possesses rights against the General Government.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, referring to the remarks made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have inserted in the RECORD, without taking the time of the Senate to read it, some correspondence with the Department of Justice as to prosecutions in New Mexico and Arizona. I will only state that there were thirty-one convictions, fifteen of which were in New Mexico, and not one of them was a Mormon. There were sixteen prosecutions in Arizona, and only ten of them were Mormons, and all of them were convicted of cohabitation on account of marriages which occurred prior to 1887.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the communication referred to by the Senator from Ohio will be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

Correspondence between Senator Smoot and the Department of Justice relating to the number of polygamists in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 27, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM H. MOODY,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On page 3640, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 9, 1906, Senator DUBOIS, of Idaho, made the following statement:

"I saw a list in the office of the Attorney-General of the United States of polygamists in Arizona, which list comprised from fifty to one hundred men and about three times as many women, and there was a large list also of polygamists in New Mexico. This has been ascertained by special agents of the Government, and of course did not include all, by any manner of means, who are living in this relation in those Territories.

If there is such a list in your office, I would be greatly obliged if you would let me know the number of men and also the number of women in the Territory of New Mexico and in the Territory of Arizona who are charged with being polygamists.

On page 3651 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the same date, Senator BURROWS, of Michigan, read extracts from a letter addressed to him from you, dated December 29, 1905, in which the following occurs:

"It will therefore be observed that the investigation conducted by the Department in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico since the matter was first called to the attention of the Department by you has resulted in thirty-one convictions in these two Territories, in the majority of the cases upon the charge of unlawful cohabitation."

Please let me know how many of these thirty-one convictions were in Arizona and how many in New Mexico, how many were for unlawful cohabitation, and how many of those convicted were understood to be members of the "Mormon" Church. If you will give me the names of those convicted, I will find out if they are members of the "Mormon" Church; but I do not wish to ask for any information which it would be in any way improper for the Department to give out.

An early reply will be appreciated, and I will be obliged for any information you may be able to convey.

Yours, very truly,

REED SMOOT.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 29, 1906.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th instant, making certain inquiries regarding the investigations conducted under the supervision of this Department of alleged violations of the laws of the United States against polygamy in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico.

The report of the special agent shows that he investigated seventy-two cases against women and thirty-two cases against men in the Territory of Arizona, and seventeen cases against women and eight cases against men in the Territory of New Mexico.

Of the thirty-one convictions to which you refer, sixteen were in Arizona and fifteen in New Mexico. The report does not indicate who, if any, of this number were members of the "Mormon" Church, nor are the names of the persons of record here. However, if you desire their names and will so inform me, I shall be glad to write the United States attorneys for the Territories in question and secure them.

Respectfully,

H. M. HOYT,
Acting Attorney-General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 2, 1906.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Department of Justice, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your letter of March 29, 1906 (C. H. R. No. 35512), and thank you for the information contained therein. I will consider it a favor if you will write to the United States attorneys for the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico and secure the names of the parties constituting the thirty-one convictions, as stated in your letter; sixteen in Arizona, and fifteen in New Mexico. I would also consider it a favor if you would ask the attorneys to indicate whether or not the persons convicted were members of the "Mormon" Church, their ages, and the dates of their marriages.

Thanking you in advance for this information, I remain,

Yours, respectfully,

REED SMOOT.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, April 2, 1906.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, asking that I furnish certain additional information concerning convictions in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico for unlawful cohabitation, etc.

I have directed the United States attorneys for these Territories to furnish the data as soon as practicable.

Respectfully,

M. D. PURDY, Acting Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, April 17, 1906.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Adverting to your letter of recent date requesting certain information regarding convictions for unlawful cohabitation in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, I beg to inclose you a copy of that portion of the letter from the United States attorney for Arizona furnishing the data for his Territory. The dates of the convictions of these persons, subsequently requested, have not yet been furnished this Department.

Respectfully,

M. D. PURDY,
Acting Attorney-General.

The names of the persons convicted of the above crimes are as follows:

For unlawful cohabitation: J. K. Rogers, Levi Savage, Joseph Fish, J. W. Brown, John P. Rothlisberger, Jacob Butler, David K. Udall, Jesse N. Smith, Henry M. Tanner, and Joseph W. Smith.

For adultery: Mariano Serrano, Mariano Gonzales, John W. Hardy, B. W. Birch, and Mrs. Kate Nelson. The latter two were jointly indicted.

For fornication: Francisco Flores.

For polygamy: Sam A. Nations.

However, from information received by me both from their counsel, the deputy marshal who arrested them, and the judge of the court who sentenced them, I can state that said ten persons were members of the Mormon Church, and that their ages in no case was under 43 years. And from information gathered from the same sources I feel safe in saying that their respective marriages dated back to no later period than 1887.

Relative to the convictions above reported for adultery, fornication, and polygamy, I beg to say that said convictions were had while my predecessor, Mr. Nave, was still in office, and I have never seen any of the defendants in said cases except Flores, Gonzales, and Hardy, and I know that they are not members of the Mormon Church. As to the other defendants in said last-mentioned cases, my information is and I feel certain in saying that they were not members of the Mormon Church. The records in my office do not show the ages of any of the defendants or their dates of marriage.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, May 14, 1906.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the report received from the United States attorney for the district of New Mexico covering the details of prosecutions for polygamy, etc., in that Territory.

Respectfully,

M. D. PURDY,
Acting Attorney-General.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR BATE.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, a few days ago I gave notice that on Saturday, the 16th instant, I would ask the Senate to consider resolutions of respect to my late colleague, Hon. WILLIAM B. BATE; but on account of the necessary absence of a number of Senators who wish to make remarks, and at their request as well as at the request of my colleagues from Tennessee in the other House, I wish to withdraw that notice, and I shall renew it at some future time.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to House bill 14396, being the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal bill, which has been pending in the Senate. I am obliged to leave the city to-morrow, and I will ask that the amendment which I send to the desk may be printed. It is to the proviso on page 10, beginning in line 11. It is intended merely to make the bill conform to the Niagara bill, which has passed both branches and is now in conference.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has kindly consented to take charge of and move the amendment in my absence. I have spoken to the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Minnesota, and they see no objection to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, having yielded all the afternoon to other business, and therefore being disappointed in the hope of disposing of the Lake Erie and Ohio River Canal bill this evening, I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up to-morrow morning after the routine morning business shall have been completed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BACON. What is the request, Mr. President?

Mr. PENROSE. To take up the Lake Erie and Ohio River Canal bill to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is that the Lake Erie and Ohio River Canal bill, which has been under consideration, shall be taken up for consideration immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR BILL.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 19264, the diplomatic and consular bill, and ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 19264 shall be taken from the Speaker's table and that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 19264. An act making appropriation for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. COUSINS, Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS, and Mr. FLOOD.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the question of the transportation and distribution of manufactured and agricultural products is the most important subject that at present or hereafter can engage the attention of the lawmaker or the political economist. Upon the correct solution of this problem depends very largely the future greatness and prosperity of this country. Every article manufactured or produced must be transported to market by some means. The question may be well divided into three classes and treated under as many different heads: (1) Transportation by rail; (2) transportation by water; (3) transportation over the common highways or dirt roads.

I need not discuss the first proposition, as many days and weeks have been consumed in the debate on the bill now in the hands of the conferees, and which will doubtless become a law in its most essential features, and which is intended to regulate interstate commerce by rail and to fix and enforce just and reasonable rates. Every phase of the subject has been presented and discussed by able and experienced lawmakers, and to my mind the question of transportation by rail is settled so far as Congress can do it. Further discussion is therefore unnecessary until different conditions demand it.

The question of transportation and distribution by water is so different from that of rail transportation that an entirely different remedy must be applied. No country on the face of the earth is so blessed with navigable rivers and lakes as ours. They are nature's highways of commerce, which we are to use in making our country great. But if we are to get the full benefit of these noble streams they must be improved, the harbors deepened, and canals constructed wherever necessary to complete a system of continuous and uninterrupted navigation. They all flow to the sea, and across the sea are our foreign markets, which we must reach at the lowest possible cost if we expect to meet and undersell our competitors. We are constructing, at a very great cost, the Panama Canal, connecting the two oceans. If our rivers are not improved and our harbors deepened, over and through which our commerce must of necessity reach the canal, we will have lost to a great extent the benefits to be derived from the expenditure of the $200,000,000 required to construct the Panama Canal. We can not reach this canal by rail. We must go by water if at all.

Mr. Speaker, in my own State of Alabama there are nearly 2,000 miles of surveyed and approved rivers, some of which are being improved, but the progress is very slow on account of the inadequate appropriations made by Congress. Some of the most important of these rivers are being neglected and flowing idly to the sea. All of them reach the Gulf of Mexico through the harbor at Mobile, the Tennessee alone excepted. This harbor is the nearest port of importance to the eastern terminus of the Panama Canal. The rivers of Alabama traverse the entire State and flow through the great iron and coal deposits, virgin forests of timber, rich agricultural lands, and inexhaustible beds of cement rock. We demand that all these splendid arteries of commerce be improved so that every day navigation to the Gulf will be secured, and that the channel at Mobile be deepened to at least 27 feet and over the outer bar to 35 feet. When this work is completed and the Panama Canal is opened to commercial use the largest coaling station in the world will be located in Alabama, near Fort Morgan, and the splendid anchorage inside the bar is sufficiently deep and large to hold all the ships that pass through the canal, where all will fill their bunkers with Alabama coal, at a cost not to exceed $1.50 per ton.

In order to show the benefits of an increased export and import trade which have followed the improvement of the harbor at Mobile, I desire to submit certain figures that will settle forever the question of returns for the money expended in improving the harbor at that place and the rivers which flow into it. During the year 1885 4 steamships and 286 sailing vessels entered that port. During the first eleven months in 1905 1,320 steamships and 488 sailing vessels entered the harbor. As late as 1894 the exports for the year were $2,823,690; the imports were $652,113. In the first eleven months of 1905 the exports were $18,407,214; the imports were $4,250,915. This is foreign trade alone. In 1884 43,830 bales of cotton were exported. In the first eleven months of 1905 180,708 bales of cotton left the port of Mobile for foreign markets. These figures show an increase of over 30,000 per cent since the active work of improving that harbor and the rivers began. I am indebted to Hon. R. H. Clarke, of Mobile, for these figures. Mr. Clarke was a Member of this House for ten years, and served on the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Mr. Speaker, God has placed at our disposal and for our use the best and surest means for regulating railroad traffic and preventing unjust and unreasonable rates. The rivers belong to the people, and can not be combined or organized into a trust or corporation of unjust discrimination. They are free to every citizen who desires to use them. As a competitor the railroads must meet the much smaller cost of water transportation. The improvement of the rivers in Alabama and other States in the Union will reduce railroad rates at every point to a minimum cost of transportation. For illustration, about three years ago, when the river and harbor bill was being considered by the committee, Mr. Jones, of Pittsburg, of the firm of Jones & Laughlin, of that city, was before us. His firm is one of the biggest manufacturing industries of the United States. He stated that when navigation was good on the Monongahela River the freight charges on coal to his factory were at the phenominally low rate of 3½ to 4 cents per ton by barge, but when an accident happened to any of the locks on the river, whenever a freeze came and navigation was stopped, the railroads immediately advanced the charges to 44 cents per ton, or over eleven times as much as the river rates were. This would apply in Alabama, with our rivers opened to navigation, the same as in Pennsylvania. The Monongahela River is not so large as the Coosa and no larger than the Warrior River in Alabama, and neither of these streams ever freeze over.

A few million dollars expended under the continuing-contract system would add many millions to the wealth of the State and save many more millions to producers and consumers. River transportation is the safety valve for unjust and extortionate railroad charges. We are to spend $200,000,000 on the Panama Canal, all of which will be virtually wasted, so far as Alabama and the Southern States are concerned, unless we improve our rivers and harbors and construct necessary canals, so that we may supply the great demands which will be made upon us for the products of our coal, iron, and ore mines, our cement deposits and valuable timber forests, our cotton and other farm products, which will thus be brought so cheaply within reach of the markets of the world. Pittsburg is now demanding $40,000,000 in order that she may have improved water transportation to the Gulf of Mexico by New Orleans. Chicago is clamoring for $60,000,000 so as to connect the Great Lakes with the Gulf. Every section of the country is looking to the completion of the canal and seeking the cheapest means of transportation to it. The producer who reaches the consumer by the cheapest methods of transportation will always find a profitable market. The cost of transportation and the facilities given to it are the greatest factors in our future greatness both as a commercial and agricultural people.

The last Congress appropriated 64 per cent of our revenues for preparation for and reparation of war, and 4 per cent to improve the rivers and harbors of the country to facilitate the transportation of our vast and rapidly increasing commerce. The State of Alabama, which I, in part, represent, is one of the richest States in the Union in natural resources. Her vast iron and coal deposits are being rapidly developed, her cotton fields are being cultivated to their utmost capacity, her timber is being marketed at profitable prices, and nothing stands in the way of her soon becoming the rival of any State unless it be the means of cheap transportation. If our rivers were improved, our products would go south of us to the markets of the world and thereby relieve the home market of the sharp competition now existing. The day is fast approaching when we must rely upon foreign markets in which to dispose of our surplus product, or else competition at home will make business unprofitable. The Birmingham district alone produced last year 37,000,000 tons of freight—more than the great ports of London and Liverpool combined. All this vast commerce is moved by rail, at an average cost of three-fourths of a cent per ton per mile. The average water rate the country over is one-fifth of a cent per ton per mile. If the projected canal from Birmingham to the Warrior River, which has been surveyed and pronounced feasible, had been completed, and the Warrior and Bigbee rivers improved, the saving would have been enough in two years to have paid for the construction of the canal and the improvement of the rivers. These improvements must come. Our growing commerce demands it. The world's markets can not be reached without it.

The cost of transporting a ton of coal by water from Pittsburg to New Orleans, a distance of 2,000 miles, is 70 cents per ton, and when the contemplated improvements are completed it is estimated that the cost will be reduced to 50 cents per ton. The cost of transporting a ton of coal from the Birmingham district to New Orleans by rail, a distance of 448 miles, is $1.50 per ton. The rate from the Birmingham district to Mobile by rail, a distance of 247 miles, is $1.25 per ton. The rate from the Birmingham district by water, by way of the Warrior and Bigbee rivers, is estimated at 30 cents per ton. The cost of transportation over the Coosa and Alabama rivers will be less than over the Warrior and the Bigbee, because the former rivers are wider and will enable a larger number of barges to be towed at one time and consequently a greater number of tons. It is known that the greater number of tons a tow carries the cheaper the rate per ton, and it is estimated that coal could be delivered for domestic and export purposes over the Coosa and the Alabama rivers at not exceeding 25 cents per ton. When the improvement on the Tennessee River at Colbert Shoals is completed and the minor obstructions between that point and Chattanooga are removed it will open a waterway to the Mississippi at Cairo and give continual water connection with all the markets on the great Mississippi River and its tributaries, including St. Louis, Cincinnati, Louisville, and Pittsburg. When the Chicago Ship Canal is completed, which the enterprising people of that wonderful city are now so vigorously pressing before Congress, all of the ports on the Great Lakes, including Duluth, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, and through the Erie Canal the great city of New York, will be connected by a continuous waterway to Chattanooga, Tenn.

The human mind can not conceive the wonderful benefits these waterways when completed will bring to the people of the Southern States. Our natural resources are almost inexhaustible, and when we consider that the value of the cotton crop in the Southern States for the last five years exceeds the entire production of gold and silver in the world by more than $400,000,000 we are forced to the conclusion that the day is rapidly approaching when the South will be the most prosperous section of the country.

It is only through a system of improved waterways that the great, cheap, and heavy products of the mine, forests, and fields are profitably brought to tidewater and thence to the world's markets. With this knowledge before us an imperative demand is upon Congress to go forward actively and energetically with a system of river and harbor improvements.

Mr. Speaker, while we are considering the question of the transportation of the products of the various industries of our country and the cost thereof, we should treat the subject from the broadest point of view. To my mind, the condition of the wagon roads, over which 90 per cent of all the commerce of the country is transported, presents a problem for legislation by Congress far more serious and important in its results than that of railroad-rate regulation. The tax imposed on agricultural products between the starting point and the railroad station or river landing by the miserable condition of these dirt roads is very much greater than the railroad or steamboat charges for carrying them to their ultimate destination. There is no necessity for making an argument to prove the value of good roads. They save worry, waste, and energy. They economize time, labor, and money, and enhance the value of property.

The authority and constitutional warrant for governmental aid to road construction is as old as the Government itself. Jefferson, Clay, Calhoun, and Webster were all in their day advocates of Government aid for good roads. Jefferson said:

> Give us peace until our revenues are liberated from debt, and during peace we may checker our whole country with canals and good roads. This is the object to which all our endeavors should be directed.

He further said:

> I experience great satisfaction at seeing my country proceed to facilitate the intercommunication of its several parts by opening rivers, canals, and roads. How much more rational is this disposal of public money than that of waging war.

Madison, in his messages to Congress, urged this policy of road building by the Government. Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, that great triumvirate and champions of the people's rights, all favored appropriations from the Federal Treasury for road construction. Good roads are the initial fountains of commerce. The cost of hauling agricultural products alone over our dirt roads in their present condition is estimated by the Agricultural Department to be $600,000,000 a year more than it would be over a system of good roads. It is estimated every time the sun sets the American farmers have lost $1,500,000 because of the poor condition of the roads. The following table of cost of transportation by the three means enumerated will perhaps interest and instruct our farmer friends:

Cost of hauling per ton, horsepower, over dirt roads 5 miles	$1.25
Cost of hauling per ton, steam power, 250 miles	1.25
Cost of hauling per ton, by river, 500 miles	1.25
Cost of hauling per ton, by steamship on Lakes, 1,000 miles	1.25

It will be seen from the above figures that the amount of money it takes to haul a ton 5 miles on our dirt roads will pay the freight for 250 miles on a railroad or 500 miles on a river and 1,000 miles on the Lakes. These figures prove conclusively the enormous tax levied by the bad roads on the farmers, and how much of their legitimate profit is consumed in hauling from the farms to the railroad station, river landing, and to the towns and cities. Not only have the farmers suffered great loss on account of poor roads, but the people in the towns and cities who depend upon them for their supplies have suffered also.

The residents of towns and cities are willing to stand their share of the expense for a system of good roads. They are the gainers because in the end they must stand a great portion of the cost of hauling farm products; they are the gainers because with good roads there will never be an oversupply of farm products in good weather and a scarcity in bad weather; they are the gainers because the mail-order business has been improved since the introduction of rural free delivery and because this increase is but the beginning of what it will be when good roads are the rule instead of the exception; they are the gainers because every act which promotes the general welfare of the country districts increases the buying power of the farmers and stimulates the commerce which makes the existence of towns and cities a possibility. With good roads the farmer does not wait for a good dry day to market his products, but goes to town in bad weather when he can not work on the farm, and when good weather comes he works to make more to carry to market. Millions of dollars are saved to the farmer by being able to go to market when his products are ready and command the highest price. What the farmer needs and must have before he prospers as his labor and industry entitle him to is good roads, so that he can go to market any day in the year when he has something to sell that somebody else needs. Good roads will make farm life more cheerful and will contribute largely to the happiness and contentment of the farmer and his family, who will become better satisfied with life in the country.

The question of governmental road construction has been successfully tried for many years in other countries. The rural population are entitled to share in the benefits bestowed by the National Government. The expense to them of improving and building roads should not be an item of worry. Roads are built and improved by contract, and the farmer can always get a good price for his labor and team when not needed on the farm. The work is usually done during the summer months when the farmer is not engaged in his crop. He can get from $3 to $4 per day for himself and team. The cost of hauling is more than half the expense of building roads in agricultural districts, and therefore instead of being a burden it will become a source of revenue, and his services and that of his team could be profitably employed every day he could spare from the farm. There is timber enough in Alabama too far from any railroad to be profitably hauled to market over the roads in their present condition which if placed on the market would pay for the improvement of every mile of road in that State. If the highways were improved every stick of this timber or the lumber manufactured from it could go to a profitable market, but the mud tax at present imposed makes this impossible.

Mr. Speaker, there is another side to this question of good roads. There is an intellectual side to it. The maintenance and extension of the free-delivery service depends upon good roads. We are appropriating this year $28,000,000 for the rural delivery service, an increase of $7,000,000 over the last appropriation for the same class of service. There is no service rendered by the Government that the people in the rural districts appreciate more highly than the delivery of their mails to their doors every day. This service was inaugurated in the year 1896, about ten years ago. Its growth has been phenomenal. When the Post-Office Department began the experiment of sending the mail to the doors of more than 20,000,000 farmers it was predicted that the expense would be so enormous that the task would never be accomplished. By the extension of rural free delivery farm life is made more attractive, and the farmer comes into daily contact with the social and business world. Every day he may receive market reports, which tell him of the price of every product he may have to sell. The daily newspapers and magazines can also be received.

The extension and perfection of this service depends largely upon the condition of the country roads. Last year 456 petitions were filed for the establishment of rural free-delivery routes in Alabama, 225 of which were reported adversely by the inspector and 224 were established. Half of the routes petitioned for were rejected mainly on account of the unsatisfactory condition of the roads over which the carrier would have to travel. Frequently routes are established upon condition that those interested in the route will improve the roads over which it goes. The Constitution gives Congress power to establish post-offices and post-roads, and every road over which there is a rural free-delivery route has been declared by an act of Congress to be a post-road. Therefore it is as much the duty of Congress to provide good roads over which the mails are to be carried as it is to establish post-offices. We are appropriating millions of dollars to build post-offices and to establish rural delivery.

Now let us begin to improve the post-roads so as to increase and extend rural delivery until all the people are supplied with daily mail at their doors. If Congress will appropriate as much money each year toward the improvement of the post-roads over which the mail must pass as it appropriates to the maintenance of the rural delivery system, in a few years the roads will be improved and all the people supplied with daily mail. The good of the service demands it. The rural free-delivery carrier, an employee of the Government, in my opinion, is entitled to better treatment. For six days in the week and fifty-two weeks in the year he is required to drive his wagon and team over a miserably rough road, which kills his horse and wears out his wagon. He is not paid a sum commensurate with his service—not as much as the city carrier, who is not required to furnish a team or wagon and who has splendid streets and pavements to travel while delivering the mail. It is important that the Government should assist in providing him with good roads over which it requires him to travel, so that he may save his horse and wagon from wear and tear and enable him to serve the Government and patrons along his route more efficiently. He should also be given at least fifteen days' vacation each year. All other Government employees receive this consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] addressed the House on April 5, in which he discussed Federal aid to road construction. He displayed such an intimate knowledge of the subject and stated so many homely truths that I beg to quote his language. He said:

> If the Army needs a road, it gets it. Even our unprofitable and expensive possessions, the Philippine Islands in the Far East, have been the objects of our solicitous care to the extent of expending $5,000,000 in building roads for them. Porto Rico, though not much larger in area than some of our counties, has had over $3,000,000 expended upon its roads since it came into our possession. During our brief occupancy of the island of Cuba our Government expended two and a half millions upon its public roads. Even those little dots out in the Pacific, the Hawaiian Islands, acquired by diplomatic legerdemain, have come in for a share and have a contemplated expenditure of two and a half millions upon their roads.
> These various sums aggregate $13,000,000 that have been expended during the past few years in building roads, not a foot of which lie within the United States. What have we against our own people that we should deny to them blessings that are freely extended to the idle islanders of the seas?
> But other interests and forces are coming to the aid of the solitary, the isolated, the unorganized, and almost unorganizable farmer. The manufacturer, learning from experience that bad roads interfere materially with his obtaining steady and continuous supplies of raw material, wants the roads improved. The millions of operatives in mines, mills, and shops are learning that bad roads increase the cost and disturb the regular supply of food products from the farms which they must have, and they want better roads. The merchant has learned that bad roads retard and depress trade, and he wants them mended. Our Post-Office Department is greatly hindered and hampered in its efforts to supply to the country regular, prompt, and reliable mail service for lack of better roads. In fact, it would be hard to name an interest, an industry, or an individual who would not be benefited by better roads.

Mr. Speaker, there are several bills pending before Congress looking to the improvement of the highways and post-roads of the country, one of which I introduced myself. The bills provide that nothing therein contained shall prevent the States or Territories or civil divisions thereof from receiving credit for labor, material, and machinery used in the construction or improvement of said highways or sections thereof. The appropriations provided shall be distributed in the following manner:

> No State or Territory shall receive in any one year a larger proportion of the sum hereby appropriated than its population bears to the total population of the United States.

It will be seen that this provision prevents one State or Territory from receiving more of the appropriation than its just proportion. Why should the farmers of the country be required to bear the whole burden of constructing and maintaining the highways and post-roads? They are not for their exclusive use. They are free to everyone who desires to travel over them or to transport commodities of any kind. Indeed, those who at present are compelled to construct and maintain these roads derive less benefit in actual returns than those who do not contribute one cent to construction and maintenance. It is the duty of the Government to give these patient, toiling people a "square deal."

Let us hasten the day when the public highways and the rivers of the United States shall become great arteries of commerce and potent factors in producing that wealth and prosperity which will indeed make us the greatest and happiest people on the earth.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill—with Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask now to return to page 66, beginning at line 3, the first paragraph under the head of "Expenses of collection of revenue from sales of public lands."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up that portion of the sundry civil bill commencing on line 3, page 66, "Expenses of the collection of revenue from sales of public lands," which was passed over without prejudice on a previous day. The Clerk will read the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPENSES OF THE COLLECTION OF REVENUE FROM SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Salaries and commissions of registers and receivers: For salaries and commissions of registers of district land offices and receivers of public moneys at district land offices, at not exceeding $3,000 per annum each, $500,000.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At end of line 9, page 66, insert the following:

"That no receivers of public moneys for land districts shall hereafter be appointed, and in all cases where the term of office of such receiver for any land district has expired or shall hereafter expire, and in all cases where the office of such receiver for any land district has or shall become vacant by reason of death, resignation, or removal, all the powers, duties, obligations, and penalties lawfully imposed upon such receivers and upon the registers of the land office for such district shall be imposed upon and exercised by such registers; and such registers shall, in addition to the duties thus imposed, have charge of and attend to the public sale of Indian lands within their respective districts, as provided by law and official regulation, and shall be accountable under their official bonds for the proceeds of such sales and for all fees, commissions, and other moneys received by them under any provision of law or official regulation; and all fees and commissions now allowable under law to both such registers and receivers shall, in all land offices for which there is no receiver of public moneys, be paid to and accounted for by the register in the same manner and in like amounts in which they are now required to be paid to and accounted for by such receivers; but the compensation of such registers shall in no case exceed $3,000 per annum.

That the Secretary of the Interior may appoint or designate a deputy register, without regard to the requirements of the classified service, for any land office in which there is not a receiver of public moneys, which chief clerk shall receive such salary, payable from the appropriation for contingent expenses of land offices, as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may authorize, and such chief clerk shall perform such duties as may be directed by the register of the land office for which he is appointed, or by official regulation, and he shall, during the absence of such register, or in case of a vacancy in the office of such register, exercise all the powers, perform all the duties, and be subject to all the obligations and penalties imposed upon such register by law or official regulation; but such chief clerk shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, execute to the United States a bond in such penal sum as the said Secretary may prescribe, with approved security, for the faithful performance of his official duties; and such chief clerk shall be accountable under his official bond for such proceeds arising from the sale of public or Indian lands within his district, and for such fees, commissions, and other moneys as may come into his hands under any law or official regulation or direction.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order this is new legislation.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the gentleman from Wyoming to reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order or reserve it?

Mr. MONDELL. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order until we can discuss the question.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to be heard on the proposition.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The matter was voted down in the committee, and not considered in the committee, and we are anxious to consider it in the House on its merits.

Mr. MONDELL. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. LACEY. I would like to be heard before the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition to save the United States of America $250,000 a year, and I thought perhaps a proposition to save the Government $250,000 is so unusual that the point of order would not be suggested against it.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand the gentleman rises to discuss the point of order?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will certainly allow the gentleman from Iowa to state his premises and state the law, so that he can discuss the point of order as to whether it is an unusual proposition.

Mr. LACEY. It is an unusual proposition, unquestionably. It will save this amount of money a year; and it being so unusual, it may be said to be new, at least in this respect.

But, Mr. Chairman, every once in a while I feel the wisdom of the old Holman rule, that any amendment on an appropriation bill which reduces the expenditures and saves money to the Government ought to be competent, ought to be proper. I suppose that as a matter of parliamentary law this amendment is a new proposition; but yet I would like to have the Chair fully understand it before ruling upon it.

In 1796 the land law was first enacted, providing for the opening of the Northwest Territory. It provided that the governor of that Territory and the Secretary of the Treasury should sell the public land. Later on the act of May 10, 1800, was passed, which provided for the registers of the land office to make the sales and for receivers of the public moneys. The condition at that time was peculiar. The public moneys received consisted of bank bills of various values and denominations, of Spanish milled dollars, of French money—in fact, of almost all kinds of money except money of the United States—and the proposition of taking care of that money and getting it into the Treasury involved a good deal of difficulty, so that a special officer was selected for that purpose. That officer being thus designated and not being fully employed, ultimately was given authority to sit in connection with the register in land cases. Having been given that jurisdiction, the office of receiver has been maintained from 1800 down to the present time, long after all necessity for its existence has disappeared.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior in their official report this year have asked that this office be abolished, and that the Register of the Land Office be directed to perform the functions, which he can do without difficulty. There is no necessity for a receiver now. There is always a national bank near into which the money may be turned as a deposit by all land officers of the United States, or nearly all, and by registered mail and postal orders the money can be readily covered into the Treasury without loss or delay. The receiver is no longer necessary.

Now, this proposition in the form in which I offer it does not do away at once with the receivers, but permits them to go out of office as their terms expire, and when one of them goes out there shall be no reappointment. The actual expense, as shown by the Commissioner of the Land Office, of this office for the last five years up to last June has been $1,471,216. If the office is abolished, it will be necessary to have one of the clerks in the office designated to perform the duties of register in the absence of the register, and to perform the duties heretofore performed by the receiver in the absence of the register also. It will require the appointment of about twenty-five chief clerks in offices that now have no clerk and the designation of a chief clerk in each of the others from among the clerical force of the office.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that the gentleman rose to discuss the point of order.

Mr. LACEY. I am stating the proposition first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa stated to the Chair that he desired to discuss the point of order. The Chair indulges the presumption that the gentleman from Iowa is laying the foundation for his discussion of the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. "How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord!" [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I think if the gentleman from Wyoming understands the proposition, he should withdraw the point of order in order to save the expenses of five or six receivers in his State. It would increase the irrigation fund by that much.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not want to ask a question that would in anywise induce the gentleman to discuss the merits of the proposition, but he said something a moment ago about the number of clerks that would have to be appointed.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; there would be about twenty-five.

Mr. RUCKER. At increased salaries, and at every session of Congress following we would be asked to increase them.

Mr. LACEY. Oh, no; not at all. A clerk in every office that has a clerk now can be designated to act.

Mr. RUCKER. Would it not mean that about twenty-five dudes from the District of Columbia would be sent out to these land offices to do the work that ought to be done by people living in the district?

Mr. LACEY. No; the amendment provides that they shall be selected outside the civil service, so that we would be relieved from that difficulty as to these particular appointments.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that we are wandering somewhat from the point of order.

Mr. LACEY. I am being led away from the point of order by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in regard to a statement of fact which he has made. I believe he has stated the figures which would represent the saving in expense to the Government if receivers were done away with.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; there would be that saving.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should like to ask the gentleman if the fees of registers and receivers are not based upon the moneys which they receive, and is it not a fact that in many instances those fees are paid by entrymen?

Mr. LACEY. Substantially all paid by entrymen.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it not true that there is no salary for registers and receivers above $500 a year, except commissions; that is, that if the commissions exceed $500 a year, no salary is paid?

Mr. LACEY. We appropriated last year out of the commissions received by these officers for their public services $285,835. Under this proposition that would all have been saved, every dollar of it, except about $25,000 to pay for additional clerks, leaving a net saving of about $260,000, based on last year's business. Now, I wish to incorporate in my remarks a statement made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The salary of each receiver is $500, with fees of his office in addition up to $3,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether, in the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman is speaking on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that up to this time the gentleman has not seriously discussed the point of order.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I have almost completed my statement as to the facts. I want to incorporate the statement of the Commissioner, which I will not take the time to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yesterday to say that he was going to object to all extraneous debate. I do not see him in his seat at this moment, and I feel somewhat disposed, as a personal friend of his, to do that which he gave notice he would do if he were here. I do not think this can possibly bear upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it does bear upon the point of order, because it states the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor, if he has anything to say on the point of order. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me, I should like to ask what improvement on present conditions it is claimed that this amendment will make?

Mr. LACEY. It will provide that one man shall do the work heretofore duplicated by two. It is just the opposite of the old proposition of making two blades of grass where only one grew before. We would have one employee of the Government where we had two before. The work would be done as well by one.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And it would change the law to that extent?

Mr. LACEY. It would change the law to that extent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then is there any necessity to argue this point any further on the point of order made by the gentleman?

Mr. LACEY. It is not a mere question of academic study. I think it is for the Committee on Rules to give us an opportunity to save this amount of money, and that is the reason I want to get the facts before the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the point of order. I think it is not necessary to discuss it at any great length.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to discuss it briefly for the enlightenment of the Chair and the House. The gentleman from Iowa, discussing the point of order, made the claim that it was in the interest of economy. If, as a matter of fact, it was permissible in discussing the point of order to go into that question of economy, it would be clearly demonstrated to the satisfaction of every Member of the House that the Government would not save a penny by the abolition of the office of receiver of the General Land Office.

Mr. PAYNE. If that is correct, why not reserve the point of order and let us discuss it? I would like a little light on it myself.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that the committee desire to get on with the bill and did not desire to have a long discussion on the subject. As a matter of fact, this would lead to a substitution of officers appointed by the President for the performance of important duties with which they are acquainted, by civil-service clerks, and in the main the change would be an additional charge upon the Treasury. The gentleman seemed to have forgotten that of this appropriation of $400,000 only $117,000 is a charge upon the Treasury of the United States, the balance being funds received as fees and commissions, and if we save this amount it will flow not into the Treasury of the United States, but into the reclamation fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the Chair is ready to rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, in line 7, page 66, I move to strike out the following words: "And receivers of public moneys."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, page 66, strike out the words "and receivers of public money."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is a change of existing law and new legislation.

Mr. LACEY. I am ready for the Chair to rule on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. A motion to strike out is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. LACEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have already obtained leave to insert in my remarks the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon this subject; and if not, I ask leave to do it now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa to print as a part of his remarks the extract from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

There was no objection.

The following is the portion of the report referred to:

RECOMMENDATION THAT THE OFFICE OF RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS FOR UNITED STATES LAND OFFICES SHOULD BE ABOLISHED AND A QUARTER OF A MILLION DOLLARS ANNUALLY SAVED TO THE GOVERNMENT.

The office of receiver of public moneys was created by the act of May 10, 1800 (2 Stat. L., 73), whereby four land offices were established, each to be under the direction of an officer to be called a register of the land office. Certain lands were, by the terms of the act, to be sold, and all the payments therefor were to be made either to the Treasurer of the United States or to such person or officer as should be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, receiver of public moneys.

By that act the duties of receivers were, generally speaking, to receive and receipt for moneys paid for the purchase of lands and duly pay over and account for the same. Subsequently, as other land offices were created, the several acts establishing the same made the same provisions for the appointment of a register and receiver at each, and this is a requirement of the law as it now stands. (See R. S., sec. 2234.)

The apparent object in appointing receivers was, perhaps, mainly for the convenience of purchasers of public lands, who were thereby relieved of the necessity of making payments directly to the Treasurer of the United States, and given an officer to whom, and a place where, payments in purchase of lands might be made with a minimum of inconvenience. In those days the transmission of money from the frontier to the Treasury was attended with much trouble, cost, and danger of loss.

The duty of the register, as his name implies, was largely that of a recording officer.

Under the act referred to neither the register nor receiver was clothed with any judicial function, nor were they required to act jointly in any particular. The judicial, or quasi-judicial, function appears to have been first conferred by the act of March 3, 1819, which provided that the register and receiver would hear testimony relative to mistakes and report the same with their opinion to the Treasurer of the United States.

By the act of May 24, 1824 (4 Stat. L., 31), the register and receiver, or either of them, might administer an oath.

By the act of May 29, 1830 (4 Stat. L., 420), proof of settlement and improvements should be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver.

By the act of June 1, 1840 (5 Stat. L., 382) a preemptor was required to make satisfactory proof of his or her residence before the register and receiver.

By the act of September 4, 1841 (5 Stat. L., 456), questions as to the rights of preemption, arising between different settlers, were to be settled by the register and receiver, subject to appeal and revision by the Secretary of the Treasury, whose appellate jurisdiction was transferred to the General Land Office by section 10 of the act of June 12, 1858 (11 Stat. L., 326).

The substance of the two last-mentioned acts is expressed in section 2273, Revised Statutes. Indeed in every instance the judicial, or quasi-judicial, function has been conferred jointly upon the register and receiver, except where abandonment is, by the terms of section 2297, Revised Statutes, required to be proven to "the satisfaction of the register of the land office." Yet by the rules of practice, even in cases of abandonment, as in the trial of all other issues before the local office, both register and receiver must pass in judgment thereon. It is now firmly established that the office is one, while its body is dual. A vacancy in either office disqualifies the remaining incumbent for the performance of the duties of his own office.

From a consideration of the foregoing it appears that the duties of the receiver have been gradually extended from those of merely receiving and accounting for public moneys to those of an officer vested with judicial functions, joint and coordinate with that of the register.

It is believed that existing conditions are such as to warrant and suggest the abolition of the office of the receiver, and the vesting in the register of the functions now performed by the receiver, for the following reasons:

1. The volume of work now transacted and receipts of money at many, if not all, of the local offices is not such as to require the services of both officers.

The following table, covering all the land offices, shows the number of clerks, the number of entries, the total receipts, and the total expense of each office; and also shows the compensation of each receiver (the register and receiver each receive the same compensation) for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905:

Of the foregoing offices, the following have recently been abolished: Huntsville, Ala.; Prescott, Ariz.; Marysville, Cal.; Akron, Colo.; Wakeeney, Kans.; Booneville and Ironton, Mo.; McCook, Nebr., and Ashland and Eau Claire, Wis.

II. The existence of the dual responsibility is the occasion of frequent and chronic disagreement between the register and receiver, to the consequent prejudice of the local office, its conduct, and all who are affected thereby. Each charges the other with responsibility for any neglect or misfeasance which may be found to exist therein.

This friction develops at times into a recrimination and antagonism which precludes that prompt and cordial cooperation necessary to an effective administration of the joint duties of the dual office, and has been the cause of much complaint from the public affected, and the expenditure of much time and labor by this office and its inspectors in the effort to compose such differences and harmonize the officers at issue, so as to restore them as a working unit to the condition of normal efficiency. It is obvious that a sole responsibility for the conduct of the local office would necessarily tend to a stimulation in the discharge of duty, consequent upon the certain knowledge on the part of the officer responsible that there could be no successful attempt on his part to evade the consequences of neglect or misfeasance by attributing it, as is now frequently done, to his joint associate. The entire clerical force of the office would be under one control and one influence. Exactness of method, certitude of information given out, uniformity of conduct, harmony of decision, and indisputable responsibility for error or misfeasance would take the place of the opposite conditions which are too often prevalent in the local offices.

III. The convenience of frequent access to and inspection of the local offices is now such as to enable this office to keep itself at all times reasonably informed of the method and efficiency of their conduct, as it could not do in former times, owing to the lack of railroads and telegraphic communication between this office and many of its subordinate officials and the absence of the thorough and efficient system of frequent inspection now in force.

The absence of the present system and facilities for communication and inspection may have been one reason which suggested, in the creation of the land offices, the desirability of having two officers who would operate as a check each upon the other. That necessity, for the reasons just stated, no longer exists.

IV. We are now brought to the consideration of the receiver's function as a joint officer.

As hereinbefore pointed out, he is required to act with the register in the performance of every judicial or quasi-judicial function, and the death, removal, or disqualification of either the register or receiver disqualifies the other, and results in practically closing the office, a condition which often occurs.

Such a condition results in great inconvenience and injury to the public and to all those who have or desire to transact business at the local offices, and creates a congestion of business often difficult to work off. All such results as now ensue from the death, removal, resignation, or disqualification of the receiver would be avoided were the register clothed solely with the authority now jointly vested in both officers and suitable provision made for the appointment of a chief clerk to act in the absence of the register.

V. It is believed that the relief from the undesirable conditions hereinbefore pointed out by the abolition of the office of receiver outweighs the problematical benefit ensuing from the exercise of his joint function with the register. It is not clear why he was so jointly vested. Be the reason what it may, now, when the principles which govern the due inception of claims made under the public-land laws are well established, and the local offices are under constant instruction and frequent inspection, and the right of appeal freely given with opportunity for its expeditious exercise and its prompt disposition, with every decision coming under the notice of this office closely scanned for the detection and correction of error therein, it is believed that the desirability for the continuance of the concurrent action by two officers, instead of one, is far less than the necessity for that increased efficiency and economy which may be accomplished by the abolition of the office of receiver.

VI. It is estimated that the abolition of the office of receiver of public moneys will result in a saving to the Government of over $250,000 per annum.

The following table will show the compensation which has been paid to the several receivers of public moneys for each year for the past five years:

Fiscal year ended June 30—
1901	$292,480.56
1902	300,757.38
1903	293,803.70
1904	285,339.32
1905	285,835.22
Total for the past five years	1,471,216.57

At the present time the following duplicate records are kept in all local land offices, viz: Register of mineral receipts; register of homestead receipts; register of final homestead receipts; register of final receipts, desert lands; register of cash receipts, in which is also kept account of coal-land receipts; homestead contest docket.

The apparent reason for keeping these duplicate sets of records is for the purpose of having one officer a check upon the other. But under the present method of handling business in local land offices there is little danger of defalcation or misappropriation of funds, as the General Land Office keeps a record of all disposals of public land and requires the local offices to properly and promptly account for the moneys they should receive therefor. Therefore, if the office of receiver were abolished the practice of keeping duplicate sets of books would be discontinued and a great saving made in clerical labor in the local land offices, which, it is believed, would offset the loss of the services of the various receivers. There would also be a consequent saving of the cost of furnishing all such duplicate books or records.

After careful consideration of the matter, it is my opinion that should the office of receiver be abolished, with the consequent keeping of the aforementioned records and general simplifying of the work, there would be no necessity for an increase in the clerical force in the various offices where clerks are now employed. It would undoubtedly be necessary to place a clerk in each of the twenty-five offices where none are now employed, and this would require an increase of $25,000 in the appropriation for contingent expenses of land offices.

Based upon the foregoing, and for the reasons therein stated, I am of opinion that there is no necessity for the continuance of the office of receiver of public moneys for United States land offices, and that it would be in the interest of both economy and good administration to abolish the office and vest the duties of receiver in the register, the act to go into effect July 1, 1906.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say very briefly that there is absolutely no necessity for the continuation of the office of receiver of the land office. The work is duplicated by the register and the receiver. All of their work is substantially duplicated. When they sit together as judges in hearing a land case, if they disagree, there is no decision, and it must be certified by the Land Office, and if they agree, it does not strengthen the proposition. So that in any event these offices now are supernumerary. The reasons that existed in 1800, when the law was passed, have long since passed away. If it is a desirable office, it carries a salary of $3,000 a year, with very little, if anything, to do, and there is nothing so sacred as an abuse; there is nothing so persistent as a sinecure, and these offices have persisted all these years, until now the Department itself has come to Congress and asked to be relieved from the appointment of any more of them, and that one man should be permitted to perform the duties which practically he has to do anyhow, and the Government should be relieved from the additional expense.

Mr. HOGG. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOGG. If your amendment prevails, what will be the effect on the local land office—what officer is authorized to receive the money?

Mr. LACEY. If this amendment prevails, some different arrangement will have to be made. That is one way of getting a remedy when an abuse occurs. When an abuse occurs and we can not get it in any other way, we should strike out the appropriation. Congress will then be compelled to act, and that is one of the remedies that Congress always has in its hands. Let me illustrate. Suppose this involved the prerogatives of the Senate, the appointment of all these receivers, 103, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and they did not desire to relinquish that prerogative; the House can cut off supplies and compel action in this way. That is the object of this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman really suppose the House would ever have the courage to do it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Under the law as it now stands, or, rather, is not this the law, that the Secretary of the Interior has the power to make the necessary rules and regulations to carry out the laws which Congress ordains, and can not he make proper regulations if we strike out this appropriation?

Mr. LACEY. I do not think so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think he can.

Mr. LACEY. I think if we strike out this appropriation we will have exercised the high function of the House of Representatives to do away with offices by refusing the salaries, and thus requiring some further legislation in order that public business may proceed.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it is not true that the mere effect of striking out this appropriation will in no way relieve the liability of the Government to pay the receivers? Their duties are prescribed by law. They are appointive officers. They will perform their duties, and their salaries continue and the Government will be liable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where is there any authority to pay them unless Congress makes an appropriation?

Mr. POWERS. They will go to the Court of Claims and get it.

Mr. LACEY. This method is an heroic remedy, and one that has been very seldom applied. It is a remedy that was used against the Crown in the old country and used with effect. It is a remedy that can be used here, and, while it has not been used for many years, here is a good place to put it in operation in this House to-day by cutting off the supplies of these supernumerary and unnecessary officers.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not understand that the gentleman from Iowa answered the question. My question is, Would not the liability of the Government to these receivers continue the same after we failed to make this appropriation as before?

Mr. LACEY. That goes without saying. I think they could go into the Court of Claims. But they would have to ask an appropriation later on, however. They would in the end be compelled to submit to the action of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman proposes by this indirect method to do away with an office established over one hundred and ten years ago. The receivers of United States land offices have been a part of the public land administration since the foundation of the Government, and for the last eighty-five years they have been important judicial officers of the Government. In my opinion no officers of the Government have rendered more helpful or important service than the receivers of the land offices of the country. It is not true that they are supernumeraries. It is not true that the existence of the dual system of register and receiver creates an unnecessary duplication of work to any considerable extent, and so far as it does it is due to departmental regulations which can be amended. These two officials sit as judge, jury, and State's attorney in all land cases. They have to pass upon the rights of contestants appearing before them in cases involving land and mineral values oftentimes running into the millions. They, as the agents of the Government, must settle important and diversified questions of law, fact, and equity as between the Government and settlers and entrymen in the case of practically every tract of public land disposed of in these United States. The system has in the main worked well. There has been little complaint of it in a hundred years until within the past year. Those who have had to do with local land offices, who understand the working of the dual system, believe that to abolish the office of receiver would not only not be in the interest of the Government, but would work great hardship and injustice to the settler and entryman. These officers receive compensation ranging from $750 to $3,000. They receive salaries of $500, the balance of their emoluments being commissions on the sales of land and fees. I do not intend to take up the time of the committee in the discussion of the many and important duties performed by these officers, of the check and safeguard to the interest of the settler and the Government alike which the office insures, but I want to discuss briefly the question from the standpoint of economy.

The gentleman from Iowa has stated that the abolition of this office would result in a saving to the Treasury of the United States of something like $250,000. Mr. Chairman, I think it can be proven without any difficulty whatever that there would be no saving to the Treasury in the abolition of the office of receiver, but that on the contrary, there will be an additional charge laid on the Treasury by the abolition of this office. As I stated a moment ago, the salaries of registers and receivers are $500 per annum. There are in the United States 117 local land offices with a register and receiver, whose joint salaries amount to a thousand dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. So that the charge upon the Treasury in this item is $117,000. That sum comes directly out of the Treasury of the United States. The further emoluments of registers and receivers come from fees and commissions. By the terms of the national reclamation act all land fees and commissions over and above those paid registers and receivers flow into the national reclamation fund, so that if you saved by this proposed legislation you would not save to the Treasury of the United States, but to the national reclamation fund.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, who owns the national reclamation fund?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that the United States owns it, but the arid-land States get the benefit of it.

Mr. PAYNE. The money that comes out of that comes out of the United States, does it not?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, not exactly; it comes from the sale of lands and fees and commissions. I come from the part of the country that is benefited by the national reclamation fund. I should be delighted to aid any legislation that would swell that fund if it could be aided without harm both to the Government and to intending settlers, but it can not be done in this way without working great hardship on settlers and causing a great loss to the Government.

Mr. BONYNGE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. BONYNGE. Has there been a bill pending before the Committee on Public Lands for the abolition of the office of receivers during this session?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; this question has been thrashed over——

Mr. BONYNGE. Has the committee made a report?

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). By the committee having jurisdiction of the subject at great length, with the result that that committee almost unanimously refused to abolish these offices. This is thrashing over old straw.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What committee refused; did the Public Lands Committee refuse unanimously?

Mr. MONDELL. I said almost.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is mistaken about that, and we are trying to reconsider it now, and I hope will do so.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; trying to reconsider it, but we have not reconsidered it. The decision was almost unanimous, and the decision of this House would be equally unanimous if the question was fully understood and discussed. In the first place, there would be no saving to the Treasury. If there was any, the saving would be to the national reclamation fund, but, Mr. Chairman, there would be no saving either to the Treasury or to the reclamation fund. The gentlemen are unfortunate in their mathematics. They assume that to abolish the office of receiver means saving of all the fees and commissions now going to the receivers, when, as a matter of fact, under the operation of the law, the moment you abolish the office of receiver in an office below the maximum the fees and commissions up to the maximum go to the remaining officer, and that on the basis of last year's business reduces this alleged saving something like $125,000. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, there would be an additional charge upon the Treasury directly, according to the statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, by the appointment of twenty-five civil-service clerks at a thousand dollars a year, he says—probably at fifteen hundred dollars—and in addition to that those who are acquainted with the operations of the land laws and the work in local land offices fully appreciate the fact that within a year of the abolition of the office of receiver there would probably be an additional civil-service clerk in every land office in the United States, and these clerks in the aggregate would cost more than the receivers now cost.

There are in the United States at this time 117 land offices. As registers and receivers receive $500 each in salary, the total amount of this appropriation which is a charge upon the Treasury is the amount of the salaries of these officers, or $1,000 for each land office, or $117,000 of the $500,000 appropriated. The remainder of the appropriation, as I have stated, is simply a limitation upon the total amount which registers and receivers may be allowed to retain of the fees and commissions collected by them during the fiscal year, to which they are entitled by law. Any of this portion of the appropriation if saved, would not flow into the Treasury, but go to the reclamation fund, for then it would become part of those surplus fees and commissions in excess of allowances to registers and receivers which flow into the reclamation fund.

In view of this condition of affairs, let us discuss for a moment the question as to the actual saving to the Treasury of the United States by the abolition of this office. As I have before stated, the actual outlay by the Treasury for the payment of registers and receivers is approximately $117,000. If the office of receiver were abolished, however, half of this amount or $58,500 would be saved to the Treasury, provided there were no other charges made upon the Treasury by reason of the abolition of the office; but the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his statement relative to the abolition of the office, says that it would undoubtedly be necessary to appoint a thousand-dollar civil-service clerk in each one of the twenty-five offices, where no clerk is now employed, to perform the duties now performed by the receiver. This would reduce the saving of $58,500 to $33,500 provided that was the only added expense, but I am of the opinion that practically everyone who has had experience with governmental methods and who is informed in regard to the amount of work in local land offices will agree, first, that instead of the Department clerks for $1,000 apiece to take the places of the receivers, such clerks would ultimately receive at least $1,500, and that in addition thereto every land office would have an additional clerk if the services of the receiver were dispensed with, and admitting for the sake of argument that these additional clerks received only $1,000 apiece, this would entail an expense for salary of $117,000, where we now pay salaries amounting to $58,500. So that instead of the Treasury saving $58,500, there would be an additional charge upon the Treasury of $58,500 by the change proposed.

It is true that the reclamation fund would gain all that the Treasury lost and more, as all fees and commissions now going to receivers which would not by operation of law go to the register were the former office abolished would go into the reclamation fund. Now, those of us who come from the arid regions, where the reclamation law operates, would be very glad, indeed, to secure this additional sum for the reclamation fund and have the cost of the maintenance of the land offices saddled upon the Treasury, which this proposition would do, but we have too keen an appreciation of the value both to the Government and the settler of the services of receivers to be willing to dispense with them, even to the pecuniary advantage of the reclamation fund.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] reminds me, rather chidingly, that the reclamation fund belongs to the people of the United States, though we are now using it in the West, and so I will discuss the matter from the standpoint of economy, as though whatever saving there might be would in the end amount to the same thing whether saved to the fund or the Treasury direct.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his report for 1905, recommends that the office of receiver of public moneys for United States land offices be abolished, and he states that a quarter of a million of dollars would annually be saved to the Government thereby. The Commissioner bases his estimate of alleged saving on the fact that the total compensation of the 117 receivers last year was $285,000, and if these offices could be abolished without incurring any additional expenditures the saving would, of course, be the amount of the salary now paid. The Commissioner gives it as his opinion that the only additional assistance that would be required by the abolishment of the office of receiver would be one clerk at $1,000 a year in each of the twenty-five land offices, where no clerks are now employed. This would entail an expense of $25,000, and, subtracting that from $275,000, the estimated amount which would be paid to receivers the coming year under the law as it now stands, the Commissioner arrives at his estimate of $250,000 as the amount that would be saved by the abolition of this office.

It is my opinion that the question of cost of maintaining the office of receiver of public moneys is by no means the most important matter for consideration in this connection, for the receivers do perform very important and valuable services to the Government and entrymen; but looking at the matter from the standpoint of economy alone I am unable to agree with the Commissioner's estimate of the saving that would result if the office were abolished.

The fact is that the saving could by no possibility amount to the full sum of the compensation of the receiver, even if no additional clerks were required. The amount saved in salaries in all cases where the compensation of each officer is less than $1,750 is only $500, if no additional clerk is required. The reason for this is plain. The register and receiver receive, first, a salary of $500 each, and above this commissions shared jointly until the maximum compensation of $3,000 each is reached. The proposed amendment abolishing the office of receiver provides that the register shall receive fees in like amounts with the fees now paid to both register and receiver up to the maximum compensation, so that the register would, if the office of receiver were abolished, receive the fees now going to both up to the maximum allowance of $2,500 in fees and $500 in salary, case wherever the total compensation of receivers is less than $2,500 they would all go to the register, and this would be the case wherever the total compensation of receivers is less than $1,750, or $500 salary and $1,250 fees.

The report of the Commissioner shows that there were twenty-one offices where the compensation of the receiver was less than $1,750 last year. The saving in these offices by doing away with the receivers would be twenty-one times $500, or $10,500 if no additional clerks were employed. As the Commissioner, however, contemplates the appointment of a $1,000 clerk at each of these offices, there would be, as a matter of fact, an added expenditure of $10,500 in these twenty-one offices instead of a gain of that amount. The Commissioner, however, evidently estimates a saving in these offices of the total amount of present compensation of the receivers, and this in the twenty-one offices above referred to amounted last year to $26,367.71. If from this estimated saving we subtracted $10,500, the actual saving in this item (doubly offset, however, by the salary of extra clerks), we have here the sum of $15,867.71 to be subtracted from the Commissioner's estimate of saving.

Nor is this all by any means, for the saving in the offices where the receiver receives between $1,750 and $3,000 would be by no means the full amount of the compensation of the receivers, not to mention the sums necessary for additional clerks. In offices of this class the saving, if no additional clerks were required, would be the difference between the amount of total joint compensation of both registers and receivers and the sum of $3,000, the maximum salary; for wherever the register and receiver are receiving less than the maximum the abolition of one officer would give the other officer the maximum compensation.

There are thirty-nine offices where the compensation of each officer was above $1,750 and below the maximum last year. The total compensation of receivers in these thirty-nine offices last year was $90,637.61, and this is evidently the amount the Commissioner estimates is to be saved. As a matter of fact, however, if no additional clerk were required after the receiver was dismissed, the saving would only be the sum of the amounts which the combined compensation in each office exceeded $3,000. I find the combined compensation of registers and receivers in these thirty-nine offices last year was $181,347.22. If the bill recommended by the Commissioner abolishing the office of receiver passed, the registers in all of these offices would receive the maximum compensation of $3,000 each, or $117,000 in all. The saving, if no additional clerks were required, would therefore be $181,347.22 less $117,000, or $64,347.22, and not $90,637.61, the compensation of receivers.

From the above it will be seen that we must again revise the Commissioner's figures by further reducing the estimated amount of saving by the difference between the amount of saving he estimates in the class of cases above cited (the amount of compensation of receivers), $90,637.61, and the actual amount under the terms of his proposed bill, $64,347.22, the difference being $26,290.39. Add this excess to the excess in the first class of cases and we have the sum of $42,159.10 to deduct from the Commissioner's estimate of saving, leaving it $207,840.90.

But this is not all by any means. The Commissioner estimates that clerks will be required in all offices where there are none now, and I have pointed out to you that to furnish these clerks at even $1,000 a year will entail an extra expense of over $10,000 above the present cost of running these offices.

If clerks are needed, in the opinion of the Commissioner, in the offices where the compensation is now small and therefore the business light, how much more will they be needed if the offices where the receiver now gets from $1,750 to $3,000 per annum? Is it not a rather violent assumption that fifty-four officers that now receive $3,000 each, that pass daily on many important questions and handle vast sums of money, can be dispensed with and no provision whatever made for anyone to take their places and perform their duties? My opinion is that there would have to be and would be within a year a chief clerk in every one of these land offices, and that in all the larger offices this clerk would receive $1,500 per year.

Remember, these clerks would, under the terms of the pending bill, be bonded officers of the Government, clothed with judicial powers in cases which often involve property worth tens of thousands of dollars and in the aggregate many millions; in many cases practically all of the property of a citizen. Many clerks in land offices now receive $1,200 a year, and as these clerks would be the chief clerks and clothed with judicial authority, they would undoubtedly receive at least $1,500 each.

There are 117 land offices. The Commissioner has estimated that 25 of the smallest and least important of these offices would require $1,000 clerks. Surely the remaining 92 will require $1,500 chief clerks, if we dispense with receivers now receiving from $1,750 to $3,000. This would involve a further expense of $138,000 per annum, still further reducing the Commissioner's estimate by this amount and leaving the net saving not $250,000, but possibly $69,840.90, probably less.

But the question as to the possible saving by the abolishment of the office of receiver is comparatively unimportant when considered in connection with the importance of the policy involved. The proposition is simply one of dispensing with the services of 117 officials, appointed by the President from among the body of the people, of men who are conversant with conditions in the public-land States, and who have had in the majority of cases considerable experience with the workings of the public-land laws, and are qualified to weigh intelligently in proofs and contests the evidence presented from the standpoint of the law, as well as of equity and good faith, which must so largely control in the settlement of public-land questions, and to substitute for them civil-service clerks, possibly at a somewhat lessened cost, who, by reason of the character of their preparation and training, can not possibly have the knowledge or experience necessary to qualify them to pass justly and equitably on questions arising between claimants or between a claimant and the Government.

It is not only a movement in the direction of further centralization, but in the direction of still further minimizing the opportunity of the settler to secure a fair statement of the basis of his claims in the first instance, thereby increasing the necessity for expensive appeal.

The assumption that the work now performed by every receiver receiving above $1,750 a year can be performed by the register and the clerks without additional help is not, in my opinion, justified by the facts. If, as a matter of fact, there are receivers who are not performing valuable services who hold their places as the sinecure which the Commissioner seems to consider them, it is, it occurs to me, the duty of the Interior Department to demand of such officers that they resign and make way for those who will perform faithfully and diligently the duties incumbent upon them, rather than make the possible shortcomings of a few the basis of a virtual indictment of all of these officers.

That receivers of the land office generally are rendering most efficient, valuable, and faithful service, both to the Government and the settler, which can not possibly be equally well performed either in the interests of the Government or the settler, and particularly the latter, by the average civil-service clerk, no matter what salary he received, I am in a position to testify from personal knowledge.

I am of the opinion that it might be in the interest of good service to provide that wherever the compensation of a receiver falls below $1,500 per annum for two consecutive years, the office shall be abolished, and the duties performed by the register. This would not be a measure of economy, but would insure offices where the business is light having one officer who received enough to pay a good man to give all his time and attention to it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to a few facts about this matter which came, in part at least, to the attention of the members of the Committee on Public Lands. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]—who, by the way, has receivers in his State drawing $14,479 as salaries, according to the official figures furnished by the Land Office, which I have in my hand—is opposed to this. Now, gentlemen, the Land Office has repeatedly recommended the abolition of these offices; and one of the reasons, gentlemen, why they are perpetually recommending this is because the duties of the receiver and the duties of the register are practically identical, and this report in substance says so. The report of the Land Office complains that, the duties of the two men being the same, they are constantly clashing, reversing each other's orders and opinions, to the public detriment. The office is an old one—established in 1800—and the reasons for it have disappeared, and the Department says that it is unnecessary now, besides being a great expense to the public, to the amount of $285,835.32 per year.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago the Commissioner was perpetually recommending the abolition of these offices.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I so understand.

Mr. RUCKER. Are you advised about it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think I am.

Mr. RUCKER. I understand to the contrary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] if the Department has not recommended repeatedly the abolition of these offices?

Mr. LACEY. I would say the word "repeatedly" would not perhaps apply.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, all right. It has been recommended in his last report, from which I shall read:

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Tennessee will turn to page 416 of the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, he will there find the testimony of the Commissioner of the Land Office in favor of the abolition of these offices.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course, and here is his recent report I have in my hand. Here, gentlemen, are the very words and many reasons of the Department for abolishing this office. I read one—

That the necessity, for the reasons just stated, no longer exists.

The reasons for having the receiver no longer exist.

Listen to this:

It is now firmly established that the office is one, while its body is dual. A vacancy in either office disqualifies the remaining incumbent for the performance of the duties of his own office.

It is believed that existing conditions are such as to warrant and suggest the abolition of the office of the receiver, and the vesting in the register of the functions now performed by the receiver, for the following reasons:

I. The volume of work now transacted and receipts of money at many, if not all, of the local offices is not such as to require the services of both officers.

II. The existence of the dual responsibility is the occasion of frequent and chronic disagreement between the register and receiver, to the consequent prejudice of the local office, its conduct, and all who are affected thereby. Each charges the other with responsibility for any neglect or misfeasance which may be found to exist therein.

III. The convenience of frequent access to and inspection of the local offices is now such as to enable this office to keep itself at all times reasonably informed of the method and efficiency of their conduct, as it could not do in former times, owing to the lack of railroads and telegraphic communication between this office and many of its subordinate officials and the absence of the thorough and efficient system of frequent inspection now in force.

And so on.

Now, then, in another part of this report you will find that the Department states what the law is, Mr. Chairman, and charges a duplication of work by the receiver and register, their duties being practically the same.

By the act of May 24, 1824, the register and the receiver, or either of them, might administer an oath.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment, for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman consider having a jury of twelve men to pass upon important questions a duplication of work?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am for a jury of twelve men every time I can get it, but two men are not twelve. The parties can finally appeal to a jury of the country in these cases. If not, they should have the right. There is no jury before a register or a receiver.

Mr. MONDELL. They are the jury and the judge.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The report says:

By the act of May 29, 1830, proof of settlement and improvement should be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver.

It must be to the satisfaction of both of the officers. Now, the officials here say that that is not necessary; that these two officers are constantly clashing, and the Commissioner wants one man responsible for the work and to pay one salary for what two men are certainly doing.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I decline to yield. The report further says:

By the act of June 1, 1840, a preemptor was required to make satisfactory proof of his or her residence before the register and receiver.

They have to make their proof before both of these officers. The Department says that is not necessary and causes a clash of authority.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has had ten minutes. I do not want to take up the time of the House further than to explain the law and answer the gentleman's speech. This report says:

At the present time the following duplicate records are kept in all local land offices, viz: Register of mineral receipts; register of homestead receipts; register of final homestead receipts; register of final receipts, desert lands; register of cash receipts, in which is also kept account of coal-land receipts; homestead contest docket.

The apparent reason for keeping these duplicate sets of records is for the purpose of having one officer a check upon the other. But disqualifies the other, and results in practically closing the office, a condition which often occurs.

I am showing you, gentlemen of the House, where there is an actual duplication in the law of the work of these two officers, where there is an actual duplication, in fact, which causes a clash of authority.

Mr. MONDELL. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman; I want to hurry through. The gentleman knows I do not want to be discourteous. The report further says:

By the act of September 4, 1841, questions as to the right of preemption arising between different settlers were to be settled by the register and receiver, subject to appeal and revision of the Secretary of the Treasury, which appellate jurisdiction was transferred to the Land Office by section 10 of the act of June 12, 1858.

This report says the office is one, but dual.

Now, then, gentlemen, the Department, as I have tried to say, though interruptedly and disconnectedly, wants to do away with having two men performing the same work, passing on the same case, clashing in authority, reversing each other, and doing duplicate work, all of which the register can do. They both receive large salaries. As I have stated, there were $14,000 paid in the State of Wyoming alone for the receiver, and yet the receiver gets his compensation for doing practically the same work, work which the Department says the register can do. Now, let us get to the amount of money that has been paid to these receivers, as set out in this recent report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, the following table will show. It is admitted that the abolition of the office of register and receiver of public money will result in the saving to the Government of over $250,000 per annum. The following table will show the compensation which has been paid to the several registers of public money in the years named:

Fiscal year ended June 30—
1901	$292,480.56
1902	300,757.38
1903	296,803.79
1904	295,339.32
1905	285,835.22
Total for the past five years	1,471,216.57

Now, gentlemen, we have been unable to get this matter before the House on its merits. I voted in committee to bring this measure before the House, and I am ready now to strike down this unnecessary duplication of officers, this cause for unnecessary clash of the authority of public officers, and save this money to the Treasury of the Government, and for the betterment of other people in other matters more important than are two officers to do the same work, one of whom is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word, and then move to close debate.

Mr. RUCKER. I have been recognized. I only want a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman only wants a minute I will yield to him after a while.

This matter was considered by the committee very thoroughly. The Commissioner of the General Land Office appeared before the committee and went into the history of the creation of this office, defined the duties, and gave us a detailed statement of the number of officers, clerks, and compensation that they were receiving. The committee is of the opinion that this work can be done as effectively, if not more efficiently, than it is now done under these two officials, and to abolish the office of the receiver will save to the Government $250,000 a year. A point of order would have been made if this had been carried in the bill, and for that reason the committee did not report a provision abolishing these offices.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa accomplishes nothing, if adopted, even if the Senate should agree to it. The receivers will continue to perform their duties as they are now performing them, because it is a statutory office, and not created by a regulation of the Secretary of the Interior. The two offices are interdependent, their jurisdiction is coequal, so that they must necessarily under the law continue to serve as they are now serving.

In case the appropriation is not provided now for their salaries in the next session of Congress we will be compelled to report on the deficiency bill the amount necessary to cover their salaries, or the receivers could go to the Court of Claims and obtain judgment for their salaries. If the gentleman from Iowa has an idea that this legislation can be inserted in the Senate, it could be done just as easily with this provision in as with it out. Therefore I do not think anything can be gained by the adoption of the amendment. I now move to close debate in two minutes, and ask that those two minutes be given to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. FORDNEY. I should like to have a few minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will make it five minutes, to be divided equally between the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes, the time being equally divided between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I will only use about two minutes, and during that time I want to say I appreciate the fact that this is an important question, one that ought not to be dealt with here under the five-minute rule. It is a subject upon which a great deal may be said on the one side and the other, but looking at these things as they are, I am surprised that gentlemen will permit themselves to be lashed into a fury and that good lawyers, able men, the most studious Members of this House, will reach entirely wrong conclusions as to the merits of the issue involved. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], as I understand him, that he is entirely in error as to the facts which are involved in this controversy. There is no duplication of work so far as receivers and registers are concerned. Mr. Chairman, I think it is unnecessary for this House to act heroically, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], in order to protect the Government against the profligate use of money at the other end of the Capitol. I have heard a great deal charged against the other branch of the legislative department of government, but this is the first time a distinguished Member of this House has taken the position that it is necessary for us to pursue this unusual course and strike out this appropriation for these officers in order to protect the country against reckless profligacy. I think this matter should be brought before the House in the usual way and full time allowed for discussion. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, a bill has been introduced and has been before the committee the entire session which provides for the abolition of all the receivers of all the land offices in the United States. The claim has been set up that if the office of receiver were abolished it would effect a saving to the Government of $250,000 a year; but there has not been one scintilla of evidence presented to the committee showing that it would save one cent to the Government. There is another provision in the bill, providing that clerks may be appointed by the President to fill the offices now occupied by the receivers, such clerks to be selected from the civil-service list. There is nothing to show how many clerks must be appointed to do the work now done by the receivers. There is nothing to show that there would be one single cent saved by the change. The registers and receivers decide all cases where there are contests in land cases, and that has been considered for many years a valuable service, because you are getting the decision of two men instead of one. One is a check upon the other. The receiver handles the money paid into the land office; the register does other work.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the abolition of the receivers and appointing in their place of clerks, because there is not a land office in the United States to-day that is up to date in the work. I know of land offices in the United States that are two years behind in their work at the present time, due to the men making entries under homestead entries, timber culture, and scrip lands, and every other kind of entry—they are two years behind in their work on account of the lack of sufficient force of clerks in the offices.

If the chairman of the committee could show that one penny can be saved by the abolishing of the receivers, I would give more favorable consideration to the matter; but nothing along those lines has been done. I know of a receiver appointed in a certain land office from Alabama, who held in his hands money paid him by entrymen for two years before sending it to the Government, and not issuing one single receiver's receipt during that whole time, and it was found out that he had this money loaned out at a very high rate of interest for his own benefit. Do you want to appoint clerks from Alabama, under civil-service rules, to do the work in land offices in Alaska or some other distant part of the country? The place from which to choose these officers is the district in which the land offices are located. I am opposed to the proposition, and, gentlemen, there is not a receiver in my district.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa to strike out.

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. LACEY was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the provision on page 73, the items under the general head of the Geological Survey.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the committee, calls up the items for the United States Geological Survey, on page 73.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, on the subject of registers and receivers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For general expenses of the Geological Survey: For the geological survey and the classification of the public lands and examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and the products of the national domain, to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States, gauging streams, and determining the water supply, and for surveying forest reserves, including the pay of necessary clerical and scientific force and other employees in the field and in the office at Washington, D. C., and all other absolutely necessary expenses, including telegrams, furniture, stationery, telephones, and all other necessary articles required in the field to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, namely:

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against a portion of the paragraph just read, that portion beginning on line 7, page 75, after the word "domain," including all of lines 8 and 9, on the ground that it changes existing law and that there is no authority in law for the provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota, in charge of this bill, if he has a copy of the original law providing for the Geological Survey?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana to state his point of order again.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The point of order includes all in line 7, after the word "domain," and lines 8 and 9, the words against which I make the point of order being:

To continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States, gauging streams, and determining the water supply.

The point is that it changes existing law. There is no authority of law for appropriations for any such purposes as those mentioned in the sentence to which the point of order is directed.

Mr. TAWNEY. What did the gentleman from Indiana ask me?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I wanted to know if the gentleman had the original law providing for the Geological Survey?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is a summary there which gives the titles—1879, I think, is the year to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; 1879. The original statute authorized the Geological Survey, under the Interior Department, to have the direction of the geological survey and the classification of the public lands, an examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain; that the Director shall have no personal or private interest, etc.; but the authorization of the work of the Geological Survey originally was confined to public lands, or the national domain.

I think this is one of the best illustrations of the evolution of departmental service, the gradual and insidious expansion of the powers and functions of the divisions and the bureaus in the various Departments of the Government.

Mr. KEIFER. I should like to ask the gentleman whether his attention has been called to the act of August, 1882, with reference to the authority of the Geological Survey to make preparation for a geological map?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not directly, but incidentally; and I have before me a precedent made in the Forty-seventh Congress, of which the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] was Speaker—although he was not in the chair and did not decide the question—a decision on the geological map proposition, rendered by Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, on a point of order made by Mr. Hiscock, of New York, on the identical proposition providing for a geological map of the United States. The point of order was sustained because the authorization was not confined to a geological map of the national domain, the only authority that the Geological Survey had to deal with it under the law calling it into existence. There is no authority in law for the Geological Survey to make a map of the United States or to gauge streams or water courses anywhere, excepting in the national domain, and in the sense of this law the term "national domain" has been construed to mean territory or land which the Federal Government owns or over which it has control.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman from Indiana contend that the words "national domain" and "public land" mean the same thing?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. For the purpose of this law I think they do.

Mr. DALZELL. I think for the purposes of this law they do not. National domain means that territory over which the nation possesses sovereignty.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand this law has been so interpreted that the Geological Survey prosecutes its work all over the country; it makes topographical surveys of counties and cities where the General Government has not a single dollar's worth of property or a foot of land; where there isn't a square rod of navigable water; that it prosecutes its work, gauging streams all over the country where there can be no possible Federal interests, without any regard to the question of navigation, but with a view of ascertaining power for private use. There is no law authorizing the Geological Survey to gauge streams or to make maps of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of California. I am not certain that I understand the full scope of the gentleman's proposed amendment. Would that cut out the matter of the gauging of streams entirely in the United States?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No.

Mr. SMITH of California. It is now carried on in connection with the Reclamation Service.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Stream gauging in connection with the Reclamation Service is a separate and distinct service.

Mr. SMITH of California. But suppose they are carrying on the gauging of streams where the reclamation project has not yet been put forward?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This would not affect it if the stream gauging was within the public domain of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of California. Suppose they wanted to gauge the streams at a point where it crossed private property, but affected the result—that is, the result might affect the reclamation project.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gauging happened to be on private property, but showed the flow over the public domain, it would be permissible even it was outside the Reclamation Service.

Mr. SMITH of California. If it crossed public lands, you couldn't make any distinction between the stream that flows across the public land or the private land. It might be partly on private land and at last the stream flow onto the public land and still be available for reclamation purposes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The point is not involved here on this point of order. The question is whether there is authority of law for the Geological Survey to gauge streams anywhere. There is no authority for it to gauge streams on public domain, because that is not enumerated among the powers and duties of the Bureau in any law bearing upon its powers and duties.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Does the gentleman contend that the Geological Survey Bureau would have no authority to make a geological map of any portion of the United States except of land owned by the Government; and if so, would that map grow less annually as the public land was taken off and occupied by homesteaders?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think it would have no authority to make a general map of the United States like the one displayed now before the committee. Congress has authority to confer that power on the Geological Survey, but Congress has never done it.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I understand your point is that the only power Congress has ever given is to make a map of the public domain owned by the Government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Congress has not done that, and it was held by former Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House that as incident to the work—the work described in the original law, the law creating this Bureau—that perhaps it might make maps and charts of the work it has done on the public domain. Now I want to cite to the Chair a case directly in point on the map question.

Mr. OLMSTED. Before the gentleman goes on to that I want to say that I notice that in the act of 1879, to which the gentleman has referred, it is provided that this officer—the Director of the Geological Survey—shall have direction of the Geological Survey and classification of "public lands;" also the examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and production of the "national domain." Now does not "public lands" mean one thing and "national domain" mean something far more extensive?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think not; I think the authors of the law had some regard to the rules of rhetoric, and in using the words "public land" in one place and "national domain" in another, he did it to avoid tautology.

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, but he has used them both again, I will call to the attention of the gentleman, in a further paragraph providing for the expense of the Geological Survey in the classification of "public lands," and then further on for the "examination of the geological structural mineral resources and products of the national domain," seeming to my mind to make the term "national domain" mean something broader than the term "public lands."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Even if that is all true, there is no authority for the gauging of streams, and there is no authority for the making of United States maps, and that is the particular point to which the question of order is directed.

Mr. OLMSTED. If the United States is part of the national domain, then it would seem to me that there is authority for making a map of it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to read some law upon that question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to offer him a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is it not a fact that owing to the law providing for the sale of the public lands, some at $10 an acre, some at $5 an acre, some at $2.50 an acre, some at $1.25 an acre, according to whether the land is mineral, stone, coal, or agricultural land, this provision is with reference to the classification of public lands, and that was better English than it would have been to use the expression "the classification of the public domain?"

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And that it was because of the use of the word "classification" that the term "public lands" was used in connection therewith, rather than "national domain?"

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman claims that the meaning of words is to be determined by the sense of rhetoric of the people who use them and not by their plain and evident meaning.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We always construe language in the connection in which it is used.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to ask the gentleman if he noticed that in the act creating the Geological Survey the act which had authorized the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region was done away with and embraced within this, as was the act for the survey of the Territories? If the gentleman's construction is true, you make this act narrower than the acts which created particular bureaus that are embraced within this act, because the Rocky Mountain region that was to be surveyed under the former act included not only land of the public domain in the sense of belonging to the Government, but also land within the States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; but what statute does the gentleman say included private lands?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will look at the statute which creates the Geological Survey, he will find the words "and the geological and geographical survey of the Territories and the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region." Now, the Rocky Mountain region, which has been provided for in the previous act, embraced not only the lands belonging to the Government, but embraces parts of the States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. And that is included within the act creating the Geological Survey.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The probabilities are if it were necessary to interpret that statute in connection with the present point of order it would be so limited as to include only the national domain in the Rocky Mountain region. It is not likely, or I mean to say it would not be proper, to presume that the Geological Survey was authorized, a Federal administrative agency, to do things that were in no sense Federal functions, that in no sense belonged to the Federal Government; and when the law provides a survey of national domain, a classification of public lands, we, of course, must infer from that that it means public lands and national domain under the control of the Federal Government, because it is a Federal agency and not a local or State agency; and the very purpose of the creation of the Geological Survey was for the furnishing of information respecting public lands, with a view of their classification and sale. I believe that is the object of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman this: When the authorization of the survey of the Rocky Mountain region was made, which was prior to this act, is it not a fact that at that time the work was done irrespective of whether it was public lands owned by the United States or not? Didn't it embrace the entire Rocky Mountain region?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not able to answer that question, but it does not have any significance in the consideration of this question. The question is, What authority has the statute conferred upon the Geological Survey? That is the sole and only question; not what it has done, not what it had done before, but what it has authority to do, and when we settle that question we have determined then whether this provision is in order.

I desire to submit this decision which I have been talking about for some minutes. In the Forty-seventh Congress, in July, 1882, when the sundry civil bill was under consideration, Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, was in the chair, and this identical provision, or part of it, was in the bill and was read. It was in the bill in these words:

And to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States.

Now, compare that with the language in this bill:

To continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States.

The identical language was contained in that bill that is in the present bill, and is involved or included in the portion of the paragraph to which the point of order is made. Mr. Hiscock made the point of order that there was no authority for the Geological Survey to make a geological map of the United States, and it was discussed by him and Mr. Adkins, of Tennessee, and others, and the Chairman in ruling upon the question said:

The Chair will rule upon the point of order. The case to which attention has been called, and on which a rule has been heretofore made, was with reference to the Geodetic Survey and its authority to proceed to the execution of that work for several miles from the coast—

That was another decision cited to the Chair, and which he distinguished—

Now, it is known to every gentleman here that the work of the Coast Survey embraces necessarily a considerable distance from the coast for scientific purposes, and therefore the Chair ruled that to be in order, as it was within the jurisdiction and in accordance with precedents. On this, however, the question presented is an entirely different one. This section of the bill provides for the geological survey and the classification of the public lands, an examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain, and is limited to that. Under that language the survey can only be prosecuted upon the national domain. But the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee here is to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States. Now, if the words "public domain" were added, the Chair would regard it as following the precedents and within the line of the work which they have been doing by maps and diagrams. But the Chair is of opinion that to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States would largely increase the functions of this survey and extend it beyond what is contemplated within the boundaries of the State and not warranted by law. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Now, it is not claimed, Mr. Chairman, that there is any authority of law anywhere for the Geological Survey to gauge streams, to determine a water supply, outside, perhaps, of the Reclamation Service, and this provision authorizes the Geological Survey to make a geological map of the United States, gauge streams, and determine the water supply throughout the entire United States. That is the interpretation and that is the practice, because the hearings show that the Geological Survey is engaged in the business of gauging streams all over the country in the old States, in the New England States, the Southern States, the Middle States, and Western States. It does gauge streams everywhere, except, I believe, upon the national domain, the only place it might have any possible show of authority to do that work.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. DAVIDSON. What would the gentleman say to the proposition that under the head of mineral resources and products of the national domain the Geological Survey would have authority to determine whether there were underground currents of water flowing in different sections, and of the products of the national domain as to whether the water power of the flowing streams on the domain were——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, I would readily say that is all fanciful; there is no basis for any such authority as that; to determine whether there may be minerals in the bed of a stream it is not necessary to gauge the stream or measure the water supply, and the water supply does not apply to the class of investigations or researches that the original law authorized.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield.

Mr. OLMSTED. I notice that the words against which the point of order is made are "to continue the preparation," etc.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. It is a fact, I believe, that appropriations have been made from year to year and the work is in progress.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I desire to know what the gentleman from Indiana says as to that branch of the rule invoked which expressly excepts Government works in progress?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, now, this is identically the same language that was contained in the provision which was held out of order in the Forty-seventh Congress, "to continue preparation of geological maps of the United States;" but another sufficient argument to that is decisions hold that the work must be a tangible object—something in the nature of a structure—that that sort of work which is in a sense abstruse or like scientific research or investigation and the preparation of results is not a public work or object coming within the sense of the rules of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. What has the gentleman to say to the decision made at this session, acquiesced in by the House, that the continuation of a list of claims was a continuation of a public work already in progress? There is nothing very tangible or very structural about that?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is in a sense structural, but that is a particular thing. Now, the gauging of streams applies to thousands of streams, all the streams in the country.

Mr. DALZELL. This applies to a thousand claims.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If it were for the gauging of the Mississippi River, for instance, and we had progressed to a certain extent upon that work, and the proposition was to continue the particular work that we had already entered upon, there would be some force in the argument of the gentleman. We authorized by resolution the Commission to prepare a publication covering the particular subject of a list of claims, and that publication was in process of preparation. The Commission had it partly completed and it was held in order to make an appropriation to complete it. I do not remember whether the question of order was raised respecting that appropriation or not, but it was simply to complete that particular specific work that had been already authorized—we had authorized it by resolution. I do not think, when I come to reflect, that instance is in point at all, because that work was authorized. It was not simply authorized by an appropriation; it was authorized by a resolution, and therefore, of course, was all in order. I think, Mr. Chairman, there can be no doubt that these items are not authorized by law. They are not public works or objects in progress within the meaning of the rule, and they should go out.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to understand exactly what the question made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is. As I understand—and he will correct me if I am wrong—his point of order is made against these words, commencing on page 75 of the bill, "To continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States, gauging streams, and determining the water supply." I understand that is the extent of the point of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think for the purpose of determining the point of order you are conclusively bound to assume that the Committee on Appropriations used this language with a full knowledge of the subject, and when they said, "To continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States," and so forth, they were stating exactly the condition of things. We have in view, before us, of the Members here a geological map of the United States, largely prepared by the Geological Survey. The law in the past authorized the Geological Survey to prepare a map, and it is one of those things that can not be finished in a short time. There will be no completion of such a map so long as the Geological Survey is engaged in its work, and so long as it is necessary to be so engaged it is probable that it will be engaged in the preparation of a geological map. It will hardly ever be completed.

Now, the law of 1879 has been read, and we seem to be sticking on the question as to whether the words used in this act, namely, "national domain," include all of the United States territory. We seem to be troubled about that, but I am not now called on, I think, to undertake to state why in a part of the same clause of the act of 1879 there were used the words "public land" and then "national domain." But let us move up a little closer to the real question made here by the point of order and come to the act of August 7, 1882, which contains a clause on the subject of the Geological Survey, and let me here at the same time dispose of the gentleman's point of order that he claims was made in the Forty-seventh Congress, when he says a decision was made favorable to his point of order made now. That decision was made when we were considering the sundry civil bill, in the month of July, 1882. It is said that the point of order was sustained by ruling out the language "to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States." The point of order was sustained against that language in the then sundry civil bill. Whatever may have been the ruling in July, 1882, the bill became a law on August 7, 1882, a month later, and it contained exactly that language and provided for a geological map of the United States. So we are not now dealing with the question of the meaning of the words

"public domain" or "national domain," because we entered upon the work of making maps by law under the act of August 7, 1882, and yearly since.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me read the clause of that act. I read from page 329 of the Statutes, volume 22, as follows:

For the United States Geological Survey and the classification of public lands and examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain, and to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States.

Is there any doubt about whether that covers the whole of the domain of the United States?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Has the gentleman made sufficient investigation of the history of that provision to know whether or not, after it was ruled out on a point of order in the House, it was inserted in the Senate and became a part of the bill?

Mr. KEIFER. That is a matter that I can not now answer, but I know it is a part of the law of 1882, and it has been a part of the law enacted each year ever since. It has been reenacted over and over every year, and the geological map that we see before us is a product of that sort of legislation, and therefore I was right in saying that the Committee on Appropriations fully understood what they were doing when they used the language here used, which is sought to be struck out, namely, "to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States."

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to correct one statement made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. Well?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is a map of the United States, not a geological map.

Mr. KEIFER. Partly a geological map, and is so marked and so called.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is partly topographical, and shows where some geological surveys have been made.

Mr. KEIFER. It may not be complete, but there are geological markings, and it is so designated on the margin and lower right-hand corner.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This map is not a topographical map and not a geological map.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman is in error. I am not talking about topography, but about a geological map.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is a map of the United States on which is indicated where topographical and geological surveys have been made, but it is neither a topographical nor a geological map.

Mr. KEIFER. Nobody supposed that it was in a completed state, but it shows that the geology of the country is marked in a general way and in parts greatly in detail. Examine the map; it shows for itself.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman state any authority for the Bureau of the Geological Survey for the beginning of the work of a geological map other than what is found in the sundry civil appropriation bill, to which he referred?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar enough with the earlier acts to state that there was an express provision in those acts requiring the Geological Survey to enter upon the making of a map, but I am prepared to say that the work of the Geological Survey would have been very worthless and useless if it had not done its work with a view to making a map. It was one of the necessary incidents of the work of the Survey that the Survey should enter upon the making of a geological map of the United States.

So, Mr. Chairman, in the act of 1882 and the acts since we have been providing for a continuation of the preparation of a geological map of the United States. That was the exact wording of the act of 1882 and of later acts, and it is quite immaterial what rule was made earlier than that, whatever the ruling was earlier than the passage of this act of August 7, 1882. I myself am of the opinion that in the use of the words "national domain" they meant the general domain of the United States. It will be impossible to have a geological survey of every piece of land by the side of land owned by individuals. Of course the original idea was to survey the public lands in the West to some extent, but it was meant to have a geological survey of all the country; and the language has been continued, and it has been recognized that a map, a Geological Survey map, was to be made, and we have been from year to year making appropriation to continue the making of a geological map of the United States, and the motion now is to strike out that part of the language that is simply the language used from year to year commencing with the year 1882.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, to sustain the gentleman's point of order it will be necessary for the Chair to hold that "public lands" and "national domain" are absolutely interchangeable terms.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask a question.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does not the gentleman believe that forest reserves are part of the public domain and not part of the public land?

Mr. DALZELL. That is in the line of my argument.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understood the gentleman, there was no distinction of public lands.

Mr. DALZELL. I say that the Chair, to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana, will have to hold that "public lands" and the "national domain," as used in the organization of the Geological Survey, are identical terms. I say that it is perfectly evident that they are not identical.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me—I do not care to discuss the point of order, but I want to correct an impression that he and many Members seem to have in regard to the organization and jurisdiction of the Geological Survey. If he will permit me to make a statement in regard to the history of the Geological Survey——

Mr. DALZELL. I know the history.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to make a statement. The Academy of Sciences reported, in obedience to a resolution passed by Congress, in favor of the organization, in which report they used the word "public domain."

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. When was that?

Mr. TAWNEY. That was in 1878. The resolution was passed by Congress. When the Academy of Sciences was incorporated Congress reserved the right to call upon it for a report on any special scientific subject. In 1878 Congress passed a resolution calling upon the Academy of Sciences for a report as to the best organization for the geological survey of the public domain. The Academy of Sciences accepted this service and made their report. In that report they spoke only of the "public domain" and defined it so that there can be no mistake as to what they intended the field of the activities of the Geological Survey to be. They clearly stated that the Survey should be limited to the public domain, and what they meant by the "public domain" was the Territories and the unsold public lands of the United States. It was upon this report that Congress authorized the organization of the Geological Survey and limited the field of its activities to the public domain. These scientific men did not contemplate or propose an organization that should include in its work a topographic and geological survey of the United States. As a matter of history I felt this statement should be made.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota has said what I intended to say, though I probably could not have said it in as clear a manner as he has; but I think it throws considerable light upon this question.

Prior to 1879 there was an inquiry made by the National Academy of Sciences as to the proper method to be pursued to bring about certain national results. The consequence of that inquiry was the passage of the act incorporating the Geological Survey, the act of March 3, 1879, and it is in these words:

For the salary of the Director of the Geological Survey, which office is hereby established under the Interior Department, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $6,000: Provided, That this officer shall have the direction of the Geological Survey, the classification of the public lands, and the examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain.

The act goes on to say:

And the geological and geographical survey of the Territories and the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region, under the Department of the Interior, and the geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian, under the War Department, are hereby discontinued, to take effect on the 30th day of June, 1879.

In other words, in addition to the specific authority contained in the sentence "classification of the public lands and examination," etc., there was an intention expressed as to all these varying subjects of national concern. The survey of these particular pieces of territory here and there was turned over to the Geological Survey, which was intrusted with the survey of the national domain. Now, what is the national domain? Why, the national domain, according to all the dictionaries that I have been able to consult, consists of the territory under the jurisdiction of the sovereign. The national domain of the United States consists of the forty-five States and the Territories of Alaska, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands. It is absolutely impossible to define the national domain in any other way.

But that is not all. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] contends that what the men who framed this act meant was this:

The classification of the public lands and the examination of their geological structure, mineral resources, and products.

That is what the gentleman says the parties who framed this piece of legislation meant to say, but that is not what they did say. They said that the Geological Survey should have charge of the classification of the public lands, but when it came to an examination of mineral resources and products, they said that they should be the mineral resources and products, not of the public lands, but of the national domain, the mineral resources and products of the entire country. Why, suppose that the Geological Survey was engaged in the investigation of the mineral resources and products of a little piece of the Territory of Arizona, immediately joining the State of Texas. The moment they struck the State line, according to my friend from Indiana, the Geological Survey would cease to have any function to perform. The functions of the Geological Survey, if my friend from Indiana is correct, have already been performed; the public lands have been classified; the mineral resources and products of the public lands are not so varied that many of them yet remain to be examined. Now, it seems to me that it is absurd to say that the gentlemen who framed this legislation had in view not so much the expression of what they intended, but had in view the matter of rhetorical beauty. My friend from Indiana says they did not want to repeat the term "public lands," that it would have been redundant, and therefore they used in the second part of the sentence the words "national domain," but they meant only to say that the classification of the public lands and the examination of their geological structure, their mineral resources, and their products should be the function of this survey. On the contrary, as it seems to me, they designedly used the right speech in determining by the use of two different terms the two different meanings that they intended to insert in the legislation. The public lands are to be classified, but the mineral resources and the products of the national domain are to be examined by the Geological Survey. Now, I end just exactly as I began. The Chair, in order to sustain the point of order, must hold that in this legislation "public lands" and "national domain" are absolutely interchangeable terms. I do not think he ought to so hold.

Mr. OLMSTED. I wish to add just a word to what my colleague has so well said. In construing a statute we must consider all of its parts. Now, we note, first, on page 394, volume 20 of the Statutes at Large, that in the act of 1879, conferring certain powers upon the Director of the Geological Survey, Congress abolished certain other surveys which plainly did have reference to land not owned by the United States. But they differentiate between public lands in the sense of lands owned by the United States and the national domain, meaning the entire territory within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Now, if, as my friend from Indiana says, they intended merely a rhetorical flourish in using these terms, see how they might with less labor have got better results:

"For the Geological Survey and classification of public lands and examination of geological structure and mineral resources and products thereof" they would have said, if they referred to public lands only; but instead of that they say "national domain," clearly referring to something larger and more extensive than public lands. They would not have abolished the other departments of surveys had they not intended that this Geological Survey should have charge of these matters in the Territories, in the region of the Rocky Mountains, and west of the one hundredth meridian.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that under that authorization the United States Geological Survey would have the right to make a geological survey of the State of Pennsylvania as a part of the national domain?

Mr. OLMSTED. It has been doing it; that has been the construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not answering the question. The mere fact that it has been done is not proof that it is authorized by law. The question is, Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania believe that under the authority conferred by the statute the Geological Survey would have the power to make a survey of the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. OLMSTED. It is a well-established principle of construction that contemporaneous exposition is most powerful in law. In that very same year in which they framed this law they appropriated for just that purpose, and have been doing it every year for twenty-five years since. That leads me, Mr. Chairman, to the other branch of the subject which I desire to discuss. These words to which the point of order is made are, "To continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States, gauging streams, and determining the water supply." It must be a conceded fact that this work has been going on for twenty-five years under annual appropriations from the Government, and that brings us to a consideration of the rule that is invoked against this paragraph, to the effect that there shall be no expenditure provided for in an appropriation bill not authorized by law, "unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." It can not be disputed that this is a work already in progress. The gentleman from Indiana says it is not a tangible work. I never heard that such a work was intangible, and I am not going to stop to discuss it except to call the attention of the Chair to two decisions that bear on the point. The first is on page 348 of the Manual, at the bottom of the page:

An appropriation to continue the marking of a boundary line of the nation is in continuation of a public work.

That was decided in the last Congress—the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. The present distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was in the chair.

Now, on the top of the next page it is recorded as having been held that "an appropriation to complete a list of claims was held to be in continuation of a public work or object." An appropriation had been made to make a list of private claims against the Government, and the list was being made. The further appropriation was asked for the completion or continuation of that list, and it was held to be in continuation of a public work or object in progress. Now, it seems to me that unless the Chair finds that these two rulings ought to be reversed, it will be compelled to overrule this point of order on the same grounds.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the point made by the gentleman from Indiana, if it has any validity, results in this proposition: That the words "public domain" mean the same as "public lands."

Mr. DALZELL. If the gentleman from Kentucky will pardon me, the words in the statute are not "public domain;" they are "national domain."

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is right. I should have said "national domain."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the latter portion of the same act creating the Geological Survey, in which it speaks of the codification of the present laws relating to the public domain. There the words used are "public domain."

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will observe, there are three phrases used to express different things—"public land," "public domain," and "national domain." Now, the absolute inaccuracy of the contention of the gentleman from Indiana is shown by one little side light.

There is a provision that the Director of the Geological Survey shall not be interested in any of the lands surveyed. Now, if the lands were public lands only of the United States and the survey was limited to public lands of the United States, it would follow, as a matter of course, that he could not be interested in any of the lands that were surveyed, and it would be absurd and useless to put in the act the words that are put in, that the Director and members of the Geological Survey shall have no personal or private interests in the lands or mineral wealth of the region under survey. If it were public land they could not have.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why couldn't they have? They could make an entry.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, unquestionably they could make an entry, but the moment they made the entry the land would cease in the true sense of the term to be the public domain of the country, and would belong to the man who had made the entry therein under the law of the United States. The Chair will notice another thing. The purpose of this act was to combine certain work that was being done by different departments under one head. There is nothing in the act to show that it was the intention of the framers of it to narrow the work to a smaller compass than existed under the particular heads that were already doing the work. Take the acts that are abolished by this. Take the act for the geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region. Is there anything in that language, has anything been pointed out by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that would show that under the act providing for the survey of the Rocky Mountain region they were limited to surveying simply public lands within the Rocky Mountain region? Is there anything within the act authorizing the survey of lands beyond the one hundredth meridian that would indicate that it is confined to public lands only? Now, if it be true that the acts that this act supersedes are broad enough to include lands not belonging to the Government as public lands, it follows that this act which intends to embrace them must also include things beyond. Then the Chair will bear in mind in construing this section that no construction which is against the common sense and purpose of an act is to be indulged in unless the plain language of the act requires it. The whole act and its purpose must be considered. It is manifest to any man who knows anything in regard to geological work, to topographical mapping, that it is practically impossible to do efficient work if you are to be confined within limited territory. As stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], if a survey had been started in the Territory of Arizona, and the work came to the boundary line of the State of California, under the narrow construction claimed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that work would have to be stopped, even although by stopping it you would not be able to follow a single lead of any ore vein of copper, of silver, or of gold, or to make a real geological survey.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman from Kentucky know that that is exactly what happens to-day under the construction of the Geological Survey?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know or admit it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman not know that unless California will cooperate with the Geological Survey in making a map the Geological Survey will not continue its work into that State?

Mr. SHERLEY. But the distinction is this: In the first place, the gentleman's facts are not correct. The cooperation with the States is given precedence because it enables the completion of the whole country at a quicker period than otherwise would happen, but the work contemplates the final doing of work all along over the whole country, and the gentleman will find from the reports of the Survey that they have never yet stopped right at the boundary of some particular section of a State line when it was necessary to go beyond. In my own State, in my own district, they are making a topographical survey now of the county of Jefferson, in the State of Kentucky, and because of the topography there, they are carrying that quarter section over into the State of Indiana in order to complete it, not confining it to State lines.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the State of Indiana is cooperating the same as the gentleman's State is.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is not cooperating the same as my State is. It may be cooperating in particular work, but the point is this: That the Geological Survey expects to map the whole country, and while they may do some particular work at some time and another particular work at another time, the act contemplates the doing of the whole of it. The construction claimed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] would limit them to a narrow strip of public domain, and the result would be that in any number of instances their work could not be completed, because their jurisdiction would end right at the point where it might be most necessary to continue it.

But, Mr. Chairman, without taking further time, I simply want to say this in conclusion, that the use of the term "national domain" is not accidental, because it occurs too often, and it occurs in juxtaposition to the use of the terms "public lands" and "public domain." There might be some plausibility lent to the argument, if, in the first section only did you find the term "national domain." It would be curious that men knowing how to use the English language should use that phrase to express the same thing as "public lands," when it does not express it to the popular mind or to any other mind, save that of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]. But when you go further down, you find them again using the expression "national domain," having used just above it the expression "public lands," and this second repetition of these two phrases must carry conviction to any mind that they had in mind something other than public lands.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the Chair indulge me upon one point that has not been made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN. Just for a moment. Now, in addition to what has been said as to the language of this act creating the Geological Survey, which refers to the classification of public lands, an examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain, I want to call the attention of the Chair to what seems to me to be an additional authority in the act. The Director of the Geological Survey is also given authority to make a geological and geographical survey of the Territories and a geological and geographical survey of the Rocky Mountain region. I apprehend, of course, that the statute giving authority to the Director to make a geological survey of any region certainly gives him authority incidentally to make a geological map of that region, because the work of the Geological Survey would be of little or no value unless it were placed in the form of a map, where it could be of public utility. Now, what is the Rocky Mountain region and what would be the making of a geological map of the Rocky Mountain region? Certainly it would not be confined to the public lands of the Rocky Mountains. The Rocky Mountain region is something greater than the Rocky Mountains themselves. It is in this instance all of that region lying west of the Missouri River and between that and the Pacific Ocean, and now, upon the admission of States, the Rocky Mountain region embraces many of the United States, notably Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, the Dakotas, Colorado, and others that might be mentioned. Now, the point that I make is that under the direct authorization——

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Rocky Mountain region embrace those States at the time or were they Territories?

Mr. MARTIN. Some were Territories and some were States at that time. Colorado was a State and Nevada was a State at the time the bill was passed, and there were other States in that region at that time. Some Territories have been admitted since, but this in no way impairs or affects the argument I seek to make upon this subject. There are now in the Rocky Mountain region additional States of the Union and have been since this language has been used repeatedly in these appropriation acts.

Now, then, the objection or point of order of the gentleman from Indiana is to an entire clause which provides a fund for the Director of the Geological Survey for continuing the making of a geological map of the United States. Undoubtedly, under the specific language to which I have referred, the Director of the Geological Survey has been amply authorized to make a geological survey at least within the Rocky Mountain region, and if to make a geological survey in the Rocky Mountain region to make a geological map of it. It will be presumed that in using any appropriation that will be made here it will not be applied to an unlawful purpose when a lawful purpose is carried in the legislation. The point I make, then, is simply this, that the point of order against this entire clause is not good, providing under this clause the Director can use this fund in any lawful way, and I insist that so far as that portion of the United States within the Rocky Mountain region is concerned this appropriation can be lawfully used to carry on the continuation of a work which is properly authorized within the act creating the Geological Survey.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think this proposition has, to some extent, been decided heretofore. It is a well-known proposition of parliamentary law that where an appropriation for a specific purpose has been carried on in an appropriation bill from year to year it is held not to be a change of existing law. In the Forty-ninth Congress a point of order was made against what is known as the "fast mail service" going South, and there the Chairman held the provision was in order in the appropriation bill because it had been carried on from year to year for some fifteen years. Now, there is an exception to that rule. It has also been held that the reenactment from year to year of a law intended to apply during the year of its enactment only does not relieve the provision in reference to the point of order. Now, the Chair will note with that exception it has been held that provisions of law reenacted from year to year are to apply to that year only. Manifestly the proposition here is not to apply to the year only in which the appropriation is made. The survey of the public lands of the United States and the gauging of the rivers of the United States can not be done in one year. It must apply as a continuing proposition or the work would have have no value whatever. Therefore I say that that exception can not apply to the provisions of this bill, but that it is a proposition on its face that contemplates the idea that it shall be considered from one year to another.

But, Mr. Chairman, on January 29, 1904, there was a provision carried on the appropriation bill then before the House that read as follows:

> To enable the Secretary of State to mark the boundary, and make the survey incidental thereto, between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada in conformity with the award of the Alaskan Boundary Commission.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that proposition was held to be in order. Why? As the Chair will note in the Digest, on page 348, it was held to be in order on an appropriation bill to continue the marking of a boundary line of the nation as the continuation of a public work. The appropriations had been made some years before for this service. They had expired. There was some intervening time, as I understand the proposition, and afterwards there was enacted into an appropriation bill provision for sufficient money to carry on the work, and the Chairman, Mr. HEMENWAY, of Indiana, then occupying the chair, held it was in order on the appropriation bill, because it was a continuation of a public work. Now, the question that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] makes in reference to this Geological Survey——

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman allow me to make a small correction?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. HEMENWAY was chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and Mr. TAWNEY was in the chair and made the ruling.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was Mr. HEMENWAY that was in favor of the proposition. The present chairman of the committee [Mr. TAWNEY] was in the chair.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted there can be no distinction between a matter being a public work, to ascertain the boundary line of the United States and for a map to gauge a stream and survey the mineral domain of the United States, or the public national domain of the United States. This is a continuing work to-day, and I contend there is no distinction between the two cases, and I think on that precedent the Chair should hold this proposition in order.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this point of order has been very fully discussed, and I do not desire to say very much upon it. I simply want to call the Chair's attention to one point with reference to the question which the Chair asked. The Chair asked the question as to the distinction between the national domain and public lands. There is no doubt the national domain includes forest reserves. But it should be remembered by the Chair that at the time the law establishing the Geological Survey was passed, which was read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], there were no national forest reserves or parks.

On this point of order, in addition, I want to say to the Chair that it is perfectly clear to my own mind, standing upon the broad proposition stated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], that this item, having been carried in an appropriation bill for many years under all the decisions and rulings of the Committee of the Whole and of the House, is the continuation of a public work. I do not see how any other view can be taken of it than that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, there is one matter to which the attention of the Chair has not been called specifically, and that is the distinction between the provision for gauging streams and determining the water supply and the other provision to which the point of order has been made. The provision for gauging streams and determining the water supply does not rest upon the same basis as the other provision, because the item for gauging streams and determining the water supply was not first carried in an independent statute, but in an appropriation bill in 1894, and therefore the argument that this provision has been sanctioned by the action of Congress, that there is a settled construction by Congress, would not apply to that item. The mere fact that an item is carried for years in an appropriation bill is not to be regarded as of any value in determining the question of the validity of the original appropriation.

Now, I think that even if the Chair should rule that the term "public lands" and "national domain" are not convertible terms, but that the latter is a very much broader term, including the whole territory of the United States, and that therefore there is authority for investigating the products and mineral resources of the whole country and for preparing a geological map, it would not follow from that decision by any means that there would be any authority for gauging the streams of the United States and determining the water supply. I wanted to call the attention of the Chair to that point, because I believe in the decision of the Chair these items may be made separable. The main purpose, so far as I can discover, of gauging these streams is stated in the answer of the Director of the Geological Survey, to a question put by a member of the committee. Mr. Walcott, in answer to the question by the chairman, "What governmental purpose does that subserve?" said:

> That serves the purpose of obtaining data in regard to flow through a succession of years on rivers running through many States, as several of them do, thus collecting information in regard to the water available for power or other useful purposes.

It is apparent from his answer that this work has no relation whatever to the investigation of the mineral resources of the United States or products of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia, and then the gentleman from Indiana, who made the point of order, and after that the Chair will decide, as the point of order has been generously discussed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there has been in many instances recognition by Congress in various statutes of the distinction between what is called "public domain" and the "national domain." There are a number of acts which show this distinction. I will call attention to the act of Congress of 1862, as amended by the act of 1888, authorizing telegraph companies to build telegraph lines over certain territory of the United States, and they always spoke of it as "public domain," showing clearly that Congress intended simply to grant power and authority to the telegraph companies to build their lines over land the title to which was in the United States as contradistinguished from "the national domain," the title to which would be in the States and in the United States.

Now, in the act of 1862, with reference to this, and the act of August 8, 1888, which is supplementary to the prior act on the subject, it uses this language, speaking of the telegraph lines:

> Shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads.

I read that for the purpose of showing that when the act of 1879, providing for the Geological Survey, used the words "national domain," that Congress meant what it said, and that in these other acts, when they used the language "public domain," they meant public lands of the United States and those lands over which the United States had exclusive ownership and jurisdiction and over which the States had no jurisdiction. Therefore, when Congress used the term "national domain," as it does in the act of 1879, it meant to authorize this geological survey upon any part of the United States, public domain of the United States, or domain of the United States which comes under the broad provision of "national domain."

One word further, Mr. Chairman. This act, up to last year and this year, provides for a continuation of this work of gauging streams—for the "continuation" of the work, showing that Congress recognized that it authorized the work to be instituted, and it has continued the work, through a number of years, in every appropriation bill since 1894. But I will call attention to the act of 1896, where the provision was made for this money for this work, and it is "to enable the Director of the United States Geological Survey to continue to gauge the streams and determine the water supply of the United States." Not water supply upon the public lands of the United States; not water supply of the navigable rivers of the United States, over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, but over the waterways of the United States. That would be synonymous, if they had stated over waterways of the national domain; and therefore this act authorized, in 1896, continuation of the work. The work has been in progress ever since. Various acts of Congress—appropriation acts, the appropriation act of 1905, the appropriation act of 1904, and in 1894 and 1895, and on—recognized it as a continuing work and for the benefit of the people of the United States. I do not think that the criticism made by the gentleman from Indiana, who makes the point of order, that the words "national domain" are synonymous and convertible with the term "public domain," is well founded. I do not care to detain the Chair any longer by reference to the other acts, but I could show them, as I have them compiled, for the benefit of the Chair, if he should wish it. The point I am insisting on is that where Congress has used the word intending to show authority over the lands of the United States, and over which the States have no control, they have invariably used the words "public domain" and "public lands;" where they intended to give authority generally to the United States they have used the words "national domain;" and to my mind the distinction is clear, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who have opposed this point of order have, in the main, it seems to me, overlooked the vital question in the case. For the sake of argument it might be admitted that the term "national domain" should have the signification contended for it. There is nothing in the statute that authorizes the making of geological maps for the United States or the gauging of streams with a view to ascertaining the water supply. There is nothing of that kind in the statute, even giving it the interpretation that gentlemen in opposition to the point of order contend.

Now, I think I can very briefly demonstrate that the term "national domain," in the sense of the law, does not have any such signification as is claimed for it by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] and other gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to the point of order. The term "national domain" has a literary meaning, an historical meaning, a political meaning, and a legal meaning, and we are dealing with it now as a part of a public statute. We are to give it its legal signification, not its literary meaning. I have before me Webster's International Dictionary, defining the meaning of the word "domain." It is defined to be "dominion, empire, authority." Nobody would pretend that the authority, the empire, of the United States is capable of being surveyed and its mineral resources determined.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Developed, you mean.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Developed. Another meaning is "the territory over which dominion or authority is exerted; the possessions of a sovereign or commonwealth, or the like."

Another is "landed property; estate; especially, the land about the mansion house of a lord, and in his immediate occupancy; demesne."

The legal meaning of the term is given by the dictionary as "ownership of land; an estate or patrimony," etc.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him there, I should like to ask if it was the intention of the Government to pursue its inquiry in the United States along the line of the legislation which we have been considering, what expression could be more effective than the term that was used in that act; and if it was used for the purpose of giving it effect and force, why should we not stand by it now?

Mr. TAWNEY. The language that the gentleman makes the point of order to is the language that is broader than that which is used in the act creating the Geological Survey.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have already suggested that to the Chair—that the provisions I object to now are not included, even giving the term the broad meaning that the gentleman contends for it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Your contention is that the appropriation bill goes further than the law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That the appropriation bill goes further than the law, under any interpretation that may be given the law in the first place.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman think there could be an examination made of the geological structure of the country without mapping it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There might, of course.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is not the matter a necessary incident?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not a necessary but a reasonable incident; but the geological survey of a county does not authorize, as an incident, a map of the whole United States.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me further to suggest there that in the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations it appeared that the State of Pennsylvania made a complete geological survey without any map, and that the sole excuse furnished for the United States spending money there is that that geological survey was not accompanied by maps?

Mr. KEIFER. I should like to interrupt. I think that is a mistake.

Mr. DALZELL. That has been partly done.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And that shows that the State of Pennsylvania did make a complete geological survey without a map.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Was it not on the ground that the survey is incomplete and the map is necessary to make it complete?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not at all. It was contended by the Director of the Geological Survey that it was hard to identify the geological survey with the location that was described without the maps, but the State of Pennsylvania made their geological survey complete without the maps.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply want to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he is aware that the act creating the Geological Survey provides for maps and for the size of the volume in which they shall be printed? It provides that memoirs and reports of this Survey shall be issued in uniform quarto series if deemed necessary by the Director, or otherwise in ordinary octavo, and it speaks of the number of copies, providing for the issuing of maps, in the very act creating the Survey.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, suppose the Geological Survey should write an exhaustive history of the United States, along political and literary lines, along with the geological report of investigations for your section, would it have authority in law to do it?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would suggest to the gentleman that under the present directorate of the Geological Survey we have a history of the United States, and a very valuable one.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That may be. I will not discuss that. In relation to this particular question, the decision I submitted to the Chair earlier in the discussion, that the right, if any right of that kind is given at all, to make a map is confined to the map of the public domain, and the decision was acquiesced in by the House. Those in charge of the bill at that time, after the proposition went out on a point of order, offered an amendment providing for the continuation and making the map of the geological survey of the national domain, putting in the limitation suggested by the Chair, and it was held in order.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have the record of the whole proceedings before me. The amendment was corrected in accordance with the suggestion of the Chair, and it was held in order. Then when the bill went to the Senate—and I have the original Senate bill—it was reported back and the words "national domain" were stricken out, and that is the way the provision got in the law. It was stricken out in the Senate, and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House held that it was not in order, because it was not confined to the national domain.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. What did the Senate put in?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Just what is in it now.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it not a fact that since that became a law—since August, 1882—we have been using the words that are used in the bill now that the gentleman seeks to have stricken out?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I take it for granted and I am willing to admit——

Mr. KEIFER. It provides for a geological map of the United States, and are we not continuing that object under Rule XXI?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am willing to admit that every appropriation bill since this ruling has contained the same language in relation to the geological map that I have made the point of order to in this bill, but it was confined to an appropriation and only created law for the fiscal year that the money was appropriated for, and did not, under the decisions of the House, become authority for subsequent appropriations.

Now, if the Chair please, I want to submit a definition from Black's Law Dictionary of the distinction between "public domain" and "national domain," if there be any. "Public domain" is defined to be: "This term embraces all lands the title to which is in the United States, including land occupied for the purpose of Federal buildings, arsenals, docks, etc., and land of an agricultural or of a mineral character not yet granted to private owners." That is the definition of "public domain." Now, "national domain" is substantially the same. This authority gives the definition of "national domain" to be: "A term sometimes used and applied to the aggregate of property owned directly by the nation." That is the only and the entire definition of the author in giving the legal definition of the terms and phrases that occur in the legislative and legal literature of the country.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Is not the point of order the gentleman has made equally applicable to almost every paragraph of the appropriation for the Geological Survey?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have not examined them carefully.

Mr. DALZELL. I will call the gentleman's attention to them and ask him.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I presume the questions will be raised as we proceed with the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. It seems to me it is a mighty important matter to know whether we are going to destroy the Geological Survey on points of order. The topographical survey is subject to a point of order, if the gentleman's position is correct.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is if there is no authority in law for it; as many of these provisions as are not authorized by existing law are subject to a point of order.

Mr. DALZELL. There is no authorization unless "national domain" means what we contend it means, and the consequence is that every item almost belonging to the Geological Survey, with one or two exceptions, is absolutely stricken out by this point of order, and this Department, which has existed for twenty-six years, is proposed to be destroyed by a point of order, and I don't believe it can be done. [Applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I think the argument has no bearing on the question of law. Congress in using the term "national domain," in the statute referred to, must, of course, have used it in its legal signification, not in its historical signification, not in its political signification, but as bearing upon the real domain of the United States in its legal sense, and that means the public domain, the public lands.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the land upon which I live, for instance, to what domain does that belong?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The chances are that it is the gentleman's domain. It is in the domain of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the domination that I have as owner.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But under what domain, in a broad term, does it belong to?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is the point I want to make, and I thank the gentleman for making the suggestion. There are two domains. There is the State dominion and the national dominion, and when the Congress came to employ the term in this statute it said "national domain;" and the gentleman's home is under the State domain, under the sovereignty or dominion or government of the State of Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But when I put up a flag on my house it is always the Stars and Stripes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no doubt about that; and the gentleman is using the term in a political sense, in the sense of empire or sovereignty.

I undertake to say this: That Congress never used the term "national domain" in the sense that it gave permission to Federal officers to go into the States upon private property, to go where Congress had absolutely no power to send public officers to perform a duty. That was not and is not and can not be a Federal duty. We must presume that in using the term Congress used it for the carrying out of some duty or function that Congress had the power to carry out. There is not a gentleman on the floor of the House who will not admit that the State of Massachusetts, the State of Pennsylvania, or the State of Kentucky could exclude every single Federal official who goes there for the purpose of making a geological survey; who goes there for the purpose of making topographical maps; who goes there for the purpose of gauging streams. It is a purely voluntary service. It is not a national function, and I appeal to the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], made a few weeks ago in the House, to refute the argument that he has advanced to-day. Congress, when it used that term, used it in its legal signification, to apply to the property that is owned by the Federal Government, property that it was preparing for the market, that it was seeking information about in order that investors might be attracted; and if this survey has been extended by acquiescence from State to State and from county to county and from township to township and municipality to municipality, it is purely a voluntary service, a service that does not belong to the Federal Government, and there is no authority of law for it. It seems to me that there can be no doubt that the point of order is well taken. I am ready to submit the question.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But what authority has the Agricultural Department for inquiring into the character of soils in the State of Michigan? It has unquestioned authority which is conceded by the State of Michigan, for it is intended to help the State and not to harm it; the people welcome it; and the national domain certainly would include all our sovereign territory, which might be properly investigated and examined.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this question has been discussed with great freedom, and is ready to submit his ruling on the question involved. It is difficult for the Chair as a Member of the House, as it doubtless is for every other Member of the House, to divorce his ideas as to what the law is, the cold-blooded law, from the sentiment involved in the controversy. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken. The only authority for the enactment of the sections to which the point of order lies is that they are public works in progress. The Chair thinks that it would have been better had the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] made the point of order on the different phrases instead of the lines. "To continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States" is one proposition. "Gauging streams and determining the water supply of the United States" is a separate and distinct proposition, and in the opinion of the Chair the point of order to these different propositions rests upon different grounds. As the Chair stated in the beginning, the broad proposition that they are public works in progress rests upon two grounds; first, that there is authority of law for the work contemplated by the section, or secondly, that even though they were never authorized by express statute, they are yet works which were begun under authority of Congress, and are therefore works in progress within the meaning, which is a well-established meaning, of the rule of this House. In order to determine whether or not there is authority of law for the first proposition, "to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States"——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, with the Chair's permission, I would like to state that I shall withdraw the point of order to that provision—the continuation of the maps—and confine it to the gauging of streams.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it is wise in the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to withdraw the point, because it rests upon an entirely different basis from the other proposition involved—gauging streams and determining the water supply. In order to determine whether or not there is authority of law for these works, either of them, recourse may be had to the statute creating the Geological Survey, defining the duties of the officer in charge, and limiting the scope of his authority. And in order that the statute may be intelligently discussed and understood it might perhaps be well to call attention to the conditions which existed with reference to the Geological Survey before the enactment of that statute. This question has been somewhat discussed by gentlemen, and the Chair will not go fully into details; but previous to that time, without any authority of law for making these surveys, appropriation bills had repeatedly contained provisions for geological surveys. For instance, in 1872 (this law having been enacted in 1879), the appropriation bill for that year contained this clause:

> For the continuation of a geological and geographical survey of the Territories of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

In 1873 there was a like provision, and again in 1875 and 1877. In other words, before the enactment of the statute of 1879, creating the office of a Geological Survey and defining the powers of the officer in charge, the appropriations for geological surveys were always confined to the Territories of the United States. Now, in 1878 the cause of the confusion which theretofore existed—and that confusion the Chair will briefly call attention to—grew out of the fact that the different Departments of the Government undertook to assume jurisdiction of various phases of geological surveys, paleontological surveys, ethnological surveys, and all that sort of thing; so that in 1879 we had a geological and geographical survey of the Territories, a geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region under the Department of the Interior, geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian under the War Department, and confusion resulted because of these several jurisdictions. Thereupon the National Academy of Sciences, in 1878, owing to this confusion and a desire that there should be order and harmony, passed a resolution in this language, which will throw some light upon the statute that was thereafter enacted in response to the demand of the National Academy of Sciences, and will throw some light upon a correct interpretation and construction of that statute.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the Chair will pardon me——

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. A resolution was adopted by Congress calling upon the Academy and Congress requested——

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair state it the other way?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Chair stated the resolution was adopted by the Academy of Sciences.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thanks the gentleman; it was a resolution adopted by Congress, as follows:

> Provided, That the National Academy of Sciences is hereby requested at their next meeting to take into consideration the method and expense of conducting all surveys of a scientific character under the War or Interior Department and the surveys of the Land Office, and to report to Congress as soon thereafter as may be practicable a plan for surveying and mapping the Territories of the United States on such general system as will, in their judgment, secure the best results at the least possible cost.

This resolution had reference solely to the Territories of the United States. Under the foregoing provision the National Academy of Sciences recommended, almost in the exact language of the statute immediately thereafter adopted by Congress:

> That Congress establish under the Department of the Interior an independent organization, to be known as the United States Geological Survey, to be charged with the study of the geological structure and economical resources of the public domain; such survey to be placed under a Director, to be appointed by the President, etc.

Having reference to what? Manifestly to what had been done always before in the history of the Geological Survey; manifestly to what had been called for by the resolution of Congress made to the Academy of Sciences, the Territories of the United States or the public domain. Now, the Chair desires to call attention to the specific item referred to, the gauging of streams and the determining of the water supply of the United States. When the statute creating the Office of Geological Survey was passed it had in it this language, and the Chair assumes that if the Geological Survey of the United States has any power, it was conferred upon the Geological Survey by the express language of this statute, and aside from this statute it has no power. Here is the provision:

> Provided, That this officer shall have the direction of the geological survey and the classification of the public lands and the examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain.

Now, will the gentleman contend, or has it been contended, that the gauging of a stream comes within any of those provisions? Manifestly not, and the Chair believes that even if the language in the appropriation bill was entirely different from what it is and confined to gauging of streams of the public domain, that it would not be in order. Can the gauging of streams be held to be a part of the geological survey, a classification of the public lands, the examination of the geological structure, the examination of the mineral resources, or an examination of the products of the national domain? The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks that the only power that the Geological Surveyor has has been conferred upon him by the express language of this statute. Aside from that he has no power, and the gauging of streams is not within the provision of these several powers conferred upon him by this statute. Therefore the Chair thinks clearly the term "gauging of streams and determining the water supply" does not fall within any of the provisions of the statute creating the Office of the Geological Survey and defining and limiting the power of its officers. Furthermore, in order to determine whether or not there is authority of law for the work contemplated, we have recourse to the statute passed in 1879, as the Chair has already said; and the Chair repeats that, in the opinion of the Chair, even if the language of the appropriation bill under consideration confined the gauging of a stream and the determining of the water supply of the United States to the national domain, it would yet not be in order. Why not? The Chair thinks it is obnoxious and the point of order should be sustained.

Secondly, because the authority conferred by the law upon the Director of the Geological Survey has reference only to the national domain. And the Chair thinks there has been some confusion in terms between the "national domain" and "public domain." The Chair believes that the District of Columbia is the national domain, but yet it is certainly not the public domain, because the public domain has reference only to the public lands, and "public domain" and "public lands" are terms interchangeably used, in the opinion of the Chair, and mean one and the same thing, and they have reference to land which can be distributed for settlement. The forest reserves are a part of the national domain, and yet are not a part of the public lands, because they have been disposed of. The Chair believes that the Territory of New Mexico is a part of the national domain, and yet vast portions of it which have already been distributed and are already settled are not a part of the public domain. The Chair thinks that that is a distinction which has been lately made and that it is the wise distinction to make in this instance.

Now, what is the other question involved? The only other jurisdiction for the enactment of this section is that it is a public work already in progress within the meaning of our rule. And the reason given therefor is that previous statutes heretofore enacted have contained this express provision. The rule of this House imposes this limitation on the power of the House as to legislation on appropriation bills, that no appropriation shall be made for any expenditure not previously authorize by law, unless such proposed expenditure is in continuation of a public work or object already in progress—that is, a public work or object previously appropriated for and yet not completed. But what is a public work in progress? In order to ascertain that, it will be necessary to have recourse to the discussions on these specific propositions. It has been repeatedly held, and held in one instance by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], that the term "public work" as contemplated by the rule of the House clearly has reference to some tangible matter, as to a building, or a road, and such other matters of a like character as will readily suggest themselves.

Now, at the first session of the Fifty-first Congress this subject was taken up, and Mr. Payson, of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in a decision which the Chair regards, after careful examination, was as well considered, if not better, than any other one made on this subject, held that the term "public work" had reference only to a tangible matter. The case is so clear in point and is so certainly decisive of the question involved that the Chair will take the liberty of calling the attention of the committee to it by quoting a part of it:

If this provision—

He says, and it is not necessary to state what provision, because the language is readily applicable to this provision—is properly in this bill at all, the point of order being raised against it, it must be, in the judgment of the Chair, because it is connected with an "object already in progress" under the statutes of the United States.

The term "public works," in the judgment of the Chair, clearly contemplates tangible matters, as buildings, roads, and such other matters as readily suggest themselves.

So the question only remains, Does the expression "objects already in progress" include the duties to be performed by this board during the ensuing year?

It must be remembered that these duties are only to hear and determine appeals from the Commissioner of Pensions to the Secretary, and to be settled by that officer, but, as it is practically impossible for the Secretary to do this, the performance of that duty is devolved upon this board as part of the force in the Secretary's office.

The duties are only part of the ordinary duties of an important executive office—routine duties, to be performed as the papers come to the Secretary's office day by day.

These duties so to be performed are not, in the judgment of the Chair, the "object in progress" contemplated by the rule.

Then the Chair well says:

The clause in the rule contemplates specific legislation for a certain purpose, for which provision has been made by law, but which specific legislation has not been consummated by an attainment of the object under the appropriation made for it and for which the appropriation made had proved insufficient.

In such case the rule allows an appropriation on a general bill to complete the "object." But the clause does not include the ordinary performance of regular routine duty by the clerical force in the Department.

A decision more clearly in point and on all fours with the present case was rendered by Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE in the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress. At that time Mr. JAMES A. TAWNEY, of Minnesota, offered this amendment.

The Chair calls attention to the similarity between the amendment offered by the gentleman, in effect, to the one under consideration at this time:

Fiber investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the investigations relating to textile fibers indigenous in or adapted to the United States, including their economic growth, cleansing, and decorticating.

The Chair again calls attention to the exact language:

Fiber investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue investigations—

Investigations having theretofore been authorized by previous appropriation bills. Thereupon, Mr. WADSWORTH, of New York, made the point of order, and the Chairman, Mr. PAYNE, held that the amendment was not in order, as the investigation was not such a tangible thing as would bring it within the exception whereby public works may be continued.

Mr. OLMSTED, of Pennsylvania, held later, under a similar point of order, public works and objects to mean "tangible matters, like buildings," etc., and "that the mere appropriation of a salary does not thereby create an office so as to justify appropriations in the succeeding year."

Now, the gist of these decisions is: Was it a public object in progress at the time the appropriation was asked for? If so, it must be a tangible work, something that would be completed. An object that could be completed at some time, something with a definite, fixed object, and not a continuing something: that it must have a definite end in sight in order to be an object in progress within the meaning of this rule. Provision for gauging streams is not a tangible object. It is not a definite something that can be concluded, nor is a determination of the water supply of the United States such a definite object in progress; and because of these statements, and because of these reasons, the Chair believes that the point of order should be sustained as to these two items, the gentleman from Indiana having withdrawn the point of order on the other item, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

If I had that voice of thunder and that throat of brass which Homer wrote of, or if I had some of the eloquence with which this Chamber resounds, I would feel that I could not use them to better purpose than in the discussion of this bill which is now before us; but the curriculum of the scientific school does not include the art of oratory. Engineers are men of deeds rather than of words, and their motto is: "Res non verba." It is possible this accounts for the few engineers sent to Congress. Moreover, I find myself somewhat hampered by the limitations of this debate under the five-minute rule, and I hope the House will be very generous with me if I have to exceed that time, as I fear I must. I feel like exclaiming with that Latin writer: "When I labor to be brief, I find that I am made obscure." Hence I am forced to write what I should like to deliver without writing.

The work of the Geological Survey is one of the most national enterprises undertaken by the Government, and can not be judged by rules which might be applied to other governmental functions.

A scientific investigation, to be of value, must be not only thorough, but complete. No reliable deductions can be drawn from a half truth; indeed, this half truth may be the most dangerous form of error. It is the acting on half truths which makes men nihilists, anarchists, and criminals.

I am willing to concede to the committee in charge of this bill that they were actuated by a sincere desire to save the public money, and economy is always to be commended unless it degenerates into parsimony, when it is not only unwise, but far more expensive than lavishness would be. I want to point out certain illustrations of this parsimonious economy falsely so called, which have come under my own observation.

The freeholders of a certain county desired to erect a stone arch bridge and applied to an engineer to superintend it. He stated his salary at $2,500 and declined the $1,500 they offered, so they, in their desire to save the difference, employed a "practical man" at $1,500. He erected the bridge, and before it was open for traffic it fell in and had to be razed to its foundations, costing the county $30,000.

I know an engineer who reported a bridge as unsafe. He did it on several occasions, and he asked for $20,000 with which to make that bridge secure, but his directors refused the money and told him to get along without it. One night in the dead of winter a train went through that bridge and 50 people were burned up and 200 more were injured. The engineer brooded over the misfortune, which was in no way his fault, until he became insane and committed suicide. It cost that road over a half million dollars for damages. While I was sorry for the accident, I was also sorry that the damages were not a million dollars instead of half a million. I could give other instances constantly occurring in the lives of engineers, showing the folly of parsimonious economy, which masquerades as economy.

The estimates submitted to the Committee on Appropriations of this House were carefully prepared by the various chiefs of bureaus in charge of the work contemplated. They were exact estimates, asking only for what was needed, neither more nor less, and there is submitted to this House an estimate made by the committee, a body that could not possibly understand the needs of the Survey, cutting down some estimates one-half, and making an average reduction of one-fifth.

One word here as to the character and attainments of the members of the Geological Survey. In common with the engineering fraternity, I have been in close touch with them for twenty years or more. Engineers look upon them as scientists of the highest standing, and accept their conclusions as reliable and of the greatest value to the profession. They are enthusiasts on the lines of discovery, and there is hardly one of them who could not better his position financially by leaving it. I know much higher salaries have been offered several, but their love for these investigations is so great, and the opportunities of the Government service for scientific research are so attractive to them that they can not be tempted by mere money. Their interest is in science and in science alone.

To show how cutting down an appropriation not only cripples an investigation, but practically neutralizes its results, take the gauging of streams when one-half the appropriation has been cut off. This work must be continuous to enable any definite conclusions to be reached. It will not answer to gauge a stream now and then. The conduct of the stream must be studied year in and year out, so as to predicate on the flow of water as to its amount, velocity, and other actions, under all possible circumstances. In order to make this work of value, it must be continued to completion. Partial results have been obtained on the gauging of streams, and as far as they go they are all right, but until they are complete they are of no practical value to anybody. It may be asked, indeed I have been asked, why the Government should undertake these matters instead of leaving them to private enterprises? There are two reasons: First, few private enterprises could conduct them on the scale on which the Government has done, and will do if this House will give them means to go forward, as they have the plant already constructed to undertake the investigations.

Mr. TAWNEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey when he obtained consent to proceed indefinitely in delivering this speech?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BOUTELL). The present occupant of the chair will state that he just took the chair, to relieve the previous occupant, and does not know what arrangement was made.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not understand that the gentleman received unanimous consent to proceed indefinitely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota and Mr. BENNET of New York, the time of Mr. WILEY of New Jersey was extended ten minutes.]

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. I said that few private enterprises could carry out this work as the Government can do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he is reading the same document that was printed in the RECORD a few days ago by the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. I really do not know. This is what I wrote myself. [Laughter.] I was not aware that the gentleman from Ohio had obtained access to my manuscript.

Mr. TAWNEY. I was informed that it was the brief prepared by the Geological Survey.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. This is a brief prepared by myself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Minnesota has referred to that two or three times. I made no pretense that that was my own production.

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not say you did.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But I think it was a credit to myself that I was able to get it, and I think it would have been a credit to the gentleman from Minnesota if he had. [Applause.]

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Second, while the Government results are disinterested and will favor no one unduly, a private investigation is always open to the suspicion of partisanship. The result announced by the Government will have a weight with the engineers and the public which the private investigation will never attain. Moreover, the subjects investigated are of inestimable value to the Government itself; for instance, take the fuel test. I saw the plant at St. Louis erected during my term as State commissioner. I understand the Government contributed $50,000 toward its erection, and from other sources $100,000 was added. The railroad companies were so impressed with the value of these experiments that they have hauled cars of fuel without charge. This is especially true of the southern and western railroads. In this connection, I want to read a report made to the President of the United States on the 6th day of June, 1906.

TO THE PRESIDENT: The executive committee of the advisory board on fuels and structural materials, recently appointed by you, respectfully ask your attention to the following facts brought out in connection with the inquiry made at the request of this board.

I omit all not bearing on the tests of fuel and structural materials.

* * * * * * *

When it is remembered that the yearly losses from fire in the United States aggregate $2.50 per capita, as compared with 33 cents per capita in European countries; that the fire losses in the United States during the past ten years have aggregated not less than $1,250,000,000; that the people expend annually in building and construction work $1,000,000,000, and that this Government itself expends annually for such purposes more than $20,000,000, it is apparent that this whole subject deserves the most serious consideration by the Government.

This committee furthermore begs to express the opinion that a thorough investigation of the properties of the materials of construction and fireproofing, and the resulting increased economies in our systems of construction, may be expected to save annually from 5 to more than 10 per cent of these total expenditures, which would mean an annual saving to the Government alone on its present expenditures of from one to two million dollars and to the people of this country a saving of many millions each year.

* * * * * * *

Very respectfully,

O. H. ERNST, Corps of Engineers, U. S. Army, Isthmian Canal Commission,
JAMES K. TAYLOR, Supervising Architect,
ROBERT W. HUNT, Chicago, Ill., President American Institute Mining Engineers,
CHARLES A. HEXAMER, Philadelphia, Chairman Board of Experts, National Fire Underwriters' Association,
HENRY G. STOTT, New York, Interboro Rapid Transit Company, Executive Committee National Advisory Board for Fuels and Structural Materials.

After a full investigation it was at once discovered that a fair grade of fuel gas could be obtained from certain lignites which had no great value previously. The importance of this to the Government is at once seen when we consider not only the more convenient location of many fuels to the points where their use by the United States is required, but a greater value arises from the results of the use of the fuel gas itself. Naval experts were at the same time testing coal, and, by the way, that was picked coal from the mines, while the Government test was of coal where the man was sent to the mines and took cars of coal as they ran from the mine, and those cars were under supervision until they arrived at the point where the coal was tested; and therefore it is a disinterested test and a fair test of the coal from that mine. Now, the naval experts were at the same time testing coal, and obtained 2.2 pounds of coal per hour per horsepower. The fuel gas obtained the same result from 0.87 pound. Not only is this saving extremely valuable, but the saving in space required for fuel on a war ship is of even much greater value in the present overcrowded condition of our naval vessels.

Take another instance, the cement test: It has been found from them that by making certain combinations of rock and slate and burning them in a peculiar manner rock hitherto supposed to be unavailable can now be made into cement equal to the Portland brand, and I have been told personally by a Government official this knowledge will save $1,000,000 per annum on Government buildings under construction.

The tests for reenforced concrete are of extreme value, not only for the construction of public buildings, but for the erection of many of the Government dams designed for the Reclamation Service on the line of the Panama Canal.

As to the mineral resources, I would like to read a few statistics.

In 1901, when the appropriation for mineral resources was placed for the first time at $50,000, the total value of the mineral production of the United States was a little over $1,086,000,000. During the last five years there has been a most remarkable development in nearly all branches of the mining industry, and according to the returns of the Geological Survey for 1905 the production for that year will exceed that of 1901 by over 50 per cent.

The history of the coal production alone is one of great interest. It is necessary to keep in touch with developments in the mining interest by correspondence, and so all these matters are utilized for the benefit of the country at large.

Under the rules it is impossible to more than indicate these matters and let the thoughtful mind carry them forward to a legitimate conclusion, but in general I want to beg of this House to view the question of appropriations for the Survey from the standpoint of the American citizen—nonpartisan, nonpolitical—and resist firmly any attempt to stifle the acquiring and distribution of knowledge, for this I consider to be not only the legitimate function of the Government, but one of its highest and most valuable functions.

In that connection I want to say that reading from the reports of the Panama Canal the other day I found that in determining the seepage through the dam at Gatun the engineer, Mr. Stearns, a week ago Sunday, in his testimony before the Canal Commission, and others, made the statement that what they relied on principally to determine the seepage in compressed earth were the experiments made by the Geological Survey, as he knew them to be thoroughly reliable. Give, then, our patient and self-sacrificing scientists an opportunity to complete their arduous tasks by restoring their appropriation to its full amount, and not only will they rise up and call you blessed, but the country at large will join with them, and the knowledge that a Member of Congress voted to continue these investigations will be a first-class campaign document this fall, and the result will be that the complexion of the next Congress will be very similar to the one that I now see around me.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if this gauging of streams is carried on in connection with the question of water-storage problem?

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. I should judge it had its bearing on it if they were storing water from that particular stream. In New York State at present they are going to build a large dam in the Catskills to get water.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The city of New York?

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. The city of New York.

Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire to call attention to several letters that I have, which, with the permission of the House, I will insert in the RECORD. When this matter was brought up I wrote to prominent men around the United States and asked them for an expression of their opinion, and I append herewith the letters which I have received in reply to the letters which I sent out. They are as follows:

YORK, PA., June 9, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
Member House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry of the 26th ultimo, which unfortunately did not reach me until now, as I am located temporarily down here at York, Pa., I will say that I trust the investigation which the Department of the United States Geological Survey has made regarding fuels, and which has been conducted at St. Louis during the past two years, may be continued still further. I consider it one of the most important subjects and one of the greatest possible value to all the industries of this country.

The work, as far as it has progressed, is well and conscientiously done, and is of an inestimable value; but I am assured that it could be still further pursued and still greater advantages obtained. No private individual and no association of engineers could have the facilities, the time, or afford the expense of arriving at a thoroughly scientific data on this subject. I have studied with immense benefit the work which has been accomplished, and I trust, as stated above, that this work will be continued.

I am, very respectfully, yours, CHARLES EKSTRAND, Mechanical and Electrical Engineer.

RICKETTS & BANKS,
CHEMISTS, ASSAYERS, AND MINING ENGINEERS,
New York, May 29, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry I would say that I have followed the work of the United States Geological Survey coal-testing plant at St. Louis with much interest. The care with which the equipment has been selected and the precautions taken to insure uniform conditions in all comparative tests have been very gratifying.

Many tests of coal have been made in the past by various operators, and some of the published records are of considerable interest and value; but the data available are scattered and incomplete. Many of the tests have been made under unfavorable conditions and many others under conditions not fully set forth, so that the results are for the greater part inconclusive and not comparable. Often they are unreliable. Faulty samples, the use of inadequate or not properly calibrated apparatus, and in many cases lack of experience of the investigator have combined to introduce factors of uncertainty, which render the reported results often unsatisfactory and unsuitable for use as a basis for close comparisons.

I doubt if there is to-day a thoroughly equipped fuel-testing plant in this country outside of the Government's plant at St. Louis. The cost of providing and maintaining such a plant is too great to be undertaken by private capital. The need of it has been sorely felt by engineers and all interested in the vast field of fuel utilization. Although the plant at St. Louis has already done some excellent work, much still remains to be accomplished. It would be an inestimable loss to engineers and the people at large if a work so favorably begun should not be carried to completion. The Survey now has a corps of trained operators and an equipment carefully standardized. The amount of money required to continue and complete the work is a trifle in comparison with the value of the data to be obtained. Let us hope that we may realize all that the opportunity presented affords, and that Congress may make a liberal provision to carry on the work to a successful completion.

Yours, very truly, JOHN H. BANKS.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., March 21, 1906.

Hon. M. E. DRISCOLL,
Congressman Twenty-ninth district, State of New York,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am in receipt of Senate Document No. 214, subject, "Fuels and structural materials," being a letter from the Secretary of the Interior to the President of the United States, "transmitting a copy of a letter from the Director of the Geological Survey embodying a summary of the results obtained in the investigations under the survey of fuels and structural materials at the testing plants at St. Louis, etc., pursuant to Senate resolution No. 68," regarding which I wish to ask your kindest attention to the recommendations of Director Charles D. Walcott. It would be impossible for anyone to overestimate the value which continued investigation upon the lines recommended would mean to this nation. The work is wholly industrial as well as thoroughly scientific in character. The results obtained are of instant application to everyone—workmen and owners alike—connected or interested in mines and manufactures.

I can not take either your time or mine to go into details further than to say that even industries as large as those I am connected with, with their able corps of chemists and other investigators, find it impossible to do all they would like to do in these suggested lines of investigation. The United States Government can best do this, and by freely publishing the results lend assistance to all interested.

A year ago, at this time, while in Washington during the mining engineers' convention, I visited the Government laboratories, and there learned many lessons as to the very great importance of the investigations being carried on. Therefore, with all the earnestness of which I am capable, I would ask you to make this subject one of serious interest, and if convinced of the truth and force of my statements, do all you possibly can toward obtaining the appropriation which will continue this important work.

I would be grateful to you, if you think it proper, to have you forward to our Senators copies of this communication, or to anyone else concerned.

With best wishes, and a hearty "thank you" in advance, I remain,

Yours, sincerely,

J. WM. SMITH,
Assistant General Manager the Solvay Process Company.

Heartily approved.

W. B. COGSWELL,
Vice-President and Managing Director.

GENERAL ELECTRIC COMPANY,
Schenectady, N. Y., June 2, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to your inquiry in relation to the practical value of the investigation of fuels begun at the St. Louis Exposition, writer feels that there is a great deal to be learned by an investigation carried on to the extent possible by the Government. There is a great deal of valuable fuel burned without proper economy, largely through ignorance in regard to the best way to burn it. The more knowledge we have on this subject the better.

Yours, very truly, A. S. MANN.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., June 4, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of May 26 relative to the continuing of the investigation of fuels, as conducted under the Geological Survey at the St. Louis Exposition during the past two years, I would say that I think it is most important that this work be carried on. I would also like to add that the information obtained from such investigations should be gotten into the hands of the public as soon thereafter as is possible in order to make such investigations as useful and practical as possible.

Yours, very truly,

ABRAM S. BALDWIN,
Assistant Manager Soda Ash Department,
The Solvay Process Company.

NEW YORK, June 2, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR WILEY: I feel impelled to write to you as to the very great value I attach to the investigations of fuels which have been going on under the Geological Survey at St. Louis, and how greatly they ought to profit the industries of this country. You are already so familiar with the general merits of the case that it is needless for me to enter into an argument, but so far as I have noticed there is a general feeling that this work is of very great public usefulness.

Yours, very truly,

HENRY M. HOWE.

FRANK KLEPETKO, CONSULTING ENGINEER,
New York, May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:—We wish to express our approval and our appreciation of the importance of continuing the investigation of fuels which has been conducted under the Geological Survey at St. Louis during the past two years. We have looked over the copies of reports which have been sent us with a great deal of interest, and as soon as we have time will go into them very much more in detail.

Trusting that you will be able to continue this excellent work, we are,

Yours, very truly,

FRANK KLEPETKO,
By C. V. DREW.

KAATERSKILL PAVING BRICK COMPANY,
Catskill, N. Y., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry in regard to the importance of continuing the investigation of fuels, which has been conducted under the Geological Survey at St. Louis during the past two years, I wish to say that I think this work will prove of very great practical value to manufacturers and others, as these tests can be relied upon, and any person wanting a certain fuel for a given purpose can at once select that fuel and know just what it will do without having to go through expensive and laborious experiments.

I am thoroughly convinced that if this is conducted in the proper manner that it will prove of vast importance to consumers.

Very respectfully, yours,

S. H. BROCKUMER, Mining Engineer.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., May 28, 1906.

Hon. WM. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WILEY: Answering your inquiry as to the importance of continuing the investigation of fuels which has been conducted under the Geological Survey of St. Louis during the past two years: I look upon this investigation as one of the most important, particularly to the manufacturing industries of the United States, that has been undertaken for many years in our country. The facts already brought out as to the best way to use the coal produced in different sections of our country will be invaluable in helping each section to use the apparatus best suited to its particular type of coal, and will also enable manufacturers to definitely decide that they can profitably build factories in certain parts of the country where in the past the question of suitable fuel has been looked upon as an almost insurmountable obstacle.

I should very strongly urge you and your friends in Congress to advocate a liberal appropriation for this purpose.

Yours, sincerely,

FRED W. TAYLOR,
President American Society Mechanical Engineers.

SIBLEY COLLEGE, CORNELL UNIVERSITY,
Ithaca, N. Y., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This letter is in response to your inquiry asking for my opinion of the work under the Geological Survey at the coal-testing plant in St. Louis.

I have received the reports of this work, and have examined them with some care, and they surely are a distinct contribution to the data available to the mechanical engineers of this country. The value of these investigations seems to me so great that I sincerely hope appropriations may be made which warrant their continuance.

Yours, respectfully,

ALBERT W. SMITH.

PENNSYLVANIA COAL AND COKE COMPANY,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Philadelphia, Pa., May 29, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry, I beg to say that, in my opinion, a continuance of the fuel investigation which has been conducted under the Geological Survey at St. Louis during the past two years is very desirable, not only from the standpoint of the producer, but from that of the consumer also, in that it gives absolutely reliable data as to the quality of the various coals of the country and their adaptability for specific purposes. This information is not at present available, and by reason of its great cost is not obtainable by the average individual or company.

Hoping that the appropriation for carrying on this important work will be made upon a liberal basis, I beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

W. A. LATHROP, President.

G. E. ALKINS, COAL AND COKE,
Chicago, May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry, I desire to say that the information furnished manufacturers and other large consumers of coal through the medium of the experiments conducted under the Geological Survey at St. Louis, Mo., is of very great value. Owing to the vast variety of coals produced in this country and the variations in their value, consumers have been at a loss frequently for proper units of value from which to calculate the relative efficiency of fuels offered for sale in the markets of the several States.

Large varieties of coal are transported to central points of distribution, and frequently they represent the products of several States. For example, Chicago, Ill., receives shipments from Pennsylvania, Maryland, the Virginias, Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Tennessee, besides the product of the mines of Illinois. Each of these States contains within its boundary numerous varieties of coal, all of which vary in value at the mine, and many of which carry variations in freights. The work of the fuel-testing plant at St. Louis has covered a wide field, and much remains to be accomplished. In fact, the field for work is practically inexhaustible, and it is of the utmost importance that these investigations be continued for a long time in the future if, indeed, the fuel-testing plant should not be permanently continued under the direction of the Survey.

Yours, very respectfully,

G. E. ALKINS.

THE PENNSYLVANIA STATE COLLEGE,
DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND MINING,
State College, Pa., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your request, I would state that the industrial life and prosperity of any nation must depend upon its husbanding its resources and using them in the most economical way possible. This has been well shown in this country by the rapid destruction of our timber, and in England by the gradual exhaustion of its iron ores and coal.

Anything that can be done to enable our coal resources to be used economically, to save the fine coal which is at the present time largely wasted, and to employ materials now considered of but little value for the production of gas, are subjects that are intimately interwoven with the future prosperity of this nation.

I feel that the testing plant of the Geological Survey has already done much in this direction, but the work needs to be continued, as far more valuable results ought and can be obtained if it is properly sustained.

I hope everything that the Government can consistently do will be done in developing the lines of research inaugurated in 1904.

Very respectfully, yours,

M. EDWARD WADSWORTH.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry of May 26, I am glad to express my approval of the work done by the Geological Survey at St. Louis during the past two years in the investigation of fuels.

The growth of the by-product coke-oven plants in the United States during the past ten years, and the certain very rapid increase of these plants, makes it very important that the country be well informed as to the quality of the different fuels available for all purposes.

The steel industry has been blessed with Connellsville coal, which has enabled a good metallurgical coke to be made with very simple means. The exhaustion of this deposit is very near, and we must turn to other fields, where coals, which will not make metallurgical coke in the ordinary beehive oven, require by-product ovens, which will make good coke.

The production of power by means of gas engines from producer gas is very rapidly coming forward, and the producer is still a crude apparatus, susceptible of very many improvements, which will make it a continuous automatic machine, capable of handling almost any kind of coal—some coals are much better adapted than others for this purpose—and especially in the recovery of by-products, both in the coke-oven and producer industries, it is important that the country has carefully made tests and records of the qualities of the different fuels.

While a great deal of work has been done by private companies and individuals in this direction, the results have not been widely published, and I believe it would be of great benefit to the country at large to have an investigation completed in an authoritative way by the Geological Survey. I think the plant for these investigations should be increased to include the very best up-to-date apparatus and instruments and placed under the control of the best experts the Government can obtain.

It is of great importance to the agricultural community, as well as to the country at large, that the criminal waste of the by-products of coal, which has been going on for centuries, be stopped, and the ammonia and tar products be utilized for fertilizers and the countless by-products which are so important to our industries.

It certainly is the function of the Government to educate the manufacturers in the saving of these by-products, and the agriculturists and textile industries in the use of them. A preliminary step in this education is the obtaining of important information as to the fuels from which these by-products will come.

I am heartily in favor of an extension of the good work, and remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

EDW. N. TRUMP,
General Manager and Chief Engineer the Solvay Process Co.
Vice-President and Consulting Engineer Semet-Solvay Co.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF PITTSBURG,
Pittsburg, Pa., June 1, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request of the 26th ultimo, asking for a letter expressing approval of the continued investigations of fuels, etc., by the Geological Survey Bureau, I inclose herewith a copy of resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburg, May 31, 1906.

Yours, very truly,

LOGAN MCKEE,
Secretary.

[Chamber of commerce. United States testing laboratory.]

Whereas an act is now pending in Congress providing for an appropriation of $350,000, the amount estimated and recommended by the Secretary of the Interior as necessary to carry on the investigations of the Geological Survey Bureau of fuels and structural materials at testing plants at present located at St. Louis; and

Whereas the board of directors of the chamber of commerce believe that such investigation should be continued and would be of inestimable value to the manufacturing interests of the country; and

Whereas the chamber of commerce of the city of Pittsburg is convinced that the ideal location for testing laboratories and investigations of this character is the city of Pittsburg, or its immediate vicinity, being the largest producer of fuel and structural materials in the world: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That this board of directors of the chamber of commerce of the city of Pittsburg requests the Senators and the Representatives from the Pittsburg district, and those Senators and Representatives from adjoining cities and counties to favor the passage of the act carrying such appropriation as may be considered sufficient, provided that the location of these laboratories be left open until the claims of the Pittsburg district can be brought before the Director of the Geological Survey.

GEOLOGIST AND MINING ENGINEER,

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MAJOR WILEY: With reference to the fuel tests which have been conducted ever since the Louisiana Purchase Exposition at St. Louis by the Geological Survey, it gives me great pleasure to say that I think the continuance of this work is of the highest importance, not only to those who are engaged solely in professional work, like myself, but principally to the country at large, and the coal industry specifically.

Many of us may differ from time to time as to methods for compiling facts and deducing conclusions, but, nevertheless, there is a proper and well-founded belief that the methods pursued by the United States Geological Survey are at least free from any criticism as to favoritism or bias, and form the only possible standard for safe comparison, which an investigation of this kind demands.

I would therefore urge an enlargement of their appropriation and their means for carrying forward these investigations to a more finite and definite degree than has heretofore been possible, and I believe that the results which shall be derived therefrom will be regarded, within and without the United States, with more respect and confidence than would be secured by any other similar investigation

Trusting that you may be in a position to still further aid this project, which I am sure you will feel has already given evidence of vigorous and lasting results of value, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

E. V. D'INVILLIERS.

GEORGE W. HARRIS, MINING ENGINEER,
Beckley, W. Va., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your kind inquiry as to my opinion relative to the importance of continuing the investigation of fuels, which has been conducted under the United States Geological Survey at their testing plant at St. Louis. I gladly avail myself of the privilege of expressing my views to you on a matter which I trust is only the initial step of such investigations. I particularly appreciate the splendid work commenced by those connected with the St. Louis experiment station, and would greatly regret its discontinuance.

Many new coal fields are being opened to-day, and reliable information about the coals of this country is in greater and greater demand, as regards their steaming, coking, and briquetting qualities.

Much has been written about the advantage of experiment stations, in which matters of the utmost importance to the mining interests could receive attention similar to the work carried on by the national and State agricultural institutions. Great Britain and the important mining continental countries have maintained for years experiment stations, which have made most important contributions to mining knowledge, while the United States, the world's largest producer of fuel, has, with the exception of the St. Louis plant, no establishment for experimental work.

I sincerely trust that the investigation of fuels may not only be continued, but that the scope of the St. Louis plant may be enlarged. Many mining problems await solution, and as a most timely illustration, I would respectfully call your attention to the numerous coal-mine explosions that have occurred in the United States within the last few years, and most recently the loss of life from that cause in West Virginia. Foreign countries have conducted experiments along the line of coal-dust explosions, among others, but further research seems to be necessary.

Thanking you for giving me this opportunity of communicating with you on this matter, I beg to remain,

Respectfully, yours,

GEO. W. HARRIS.

GEOLOGIC AND TOPOGRAPHIC SURVEY, COMMISSION OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Harrisburg, Pa., May 28, 1906.

The Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your request for an expression of opinion from me as to the importance of continuing the investigation of fuels, which has been conducted under the Geological Survey at St. Louis during the past two years, I can only say that I regard this work as among the most important conducted by the Government. The results already obtained have been extremely interesting and of great economic value to the fuel industry and manufacturing interest of the entire country; and the benefits to be derived are not confined to those States which are producers of coal. While it is true that we have large coal resources in this country, it is equally true that, at the present rate of consumption, these must soon become exhausted; and therefore the proper use of the fuel, so as to obtain its full power efficiency, should be ascertained as speedily as possible, and in no way can this be done except under the auspices of the United States Government. Our Government itself should have much interest in the matter, and especially in connection with the Navy Department. I sincerely hope that the recommendations of the Director of the United States Geological Survey will meet with that hearty response from the Members of Congress which the importance of the work so well justifies.

I have understood that should the testing plant now located at St. Louis, be moved to Pennsylvania—and Pittsburg seems to be the logical place for its location—Mr. Carnegie stands ready to contribute a large sum of money for its proper installation there. I can well commend the recommendations of the Director of the Survey to your favorable consideration.

Very truly, yours, ANDREW S. MCCREATH, Commissioner.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WILEY: In response to your request of the 26th instant, asking my opinion of the importance of continuing the investigation of fuels which has been conducted under the Geological Survey at St. Louis during the past two years, permit me to express my thorough appreciation of the excellent work thus far done and to hope that the investigations will not only be continued, but extended to include more thoroughly both the eastern bituminous and anthracite regions.

There is great need for authoritative data in regard to coal which this investigation is admirably supplying, and I sincerely hope that there can be no question of Congress appropriating the necessary funds for its continuance.

Yours, very truly, R. V. NORRIS, Consulting Engineer.

AMERICAN LOCOMOTIVE COMPANY,
Richmond, Va., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry in regard to the value of the investigation of the relative heat values of coal of the United States, together with the investigation of structural material, I wish to say that data of this kind is of inestimable value to the users of coal and structural material.

Owing to the lack of data as to the relative heating value of different coals, users are entirely dependent on statements of the mines, without individual investigations, which in nearly all cases is impracticable, and consequently a great deal of money is lost by using fuel not adapted for the individual requirements.

The reports gotten out by the United States Geological Survey, in their Professional Paper No. 48, supplies a great deal of valuable information of this character, and it will be of material assistance not only in engineering circles, but to all engaged in manufacturing industries, if this work is extended and completed.

I trust that the Government will be able to see the importance of the work undertaken, and provide sufficient funds to carry it out in the way that it should be finished, as it would be an appropriation from which the country would derive a direct benefit.

Yours, truly,

V. Z. CRAVAREISTI, Shop Engineer.

PHILADELPHIA, May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I trespass upon your time most briefly and only to express the sincere hope that the investigation of fuels under the United States Geological Survey at St. Louis may be continued.

To the country at large the results of this research work should be of immense value.

Yours, very truly, WM. G. NEILSON.

BEECH CREEK COAL AND COKE COMPANY,

Hon. W. H. WILEY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reference to the question of the investigations of fuels which have been conducted under the Geological Survey at St. Louis during the past two years, we learn that the matter of continuing these investigations is in question.

We certainly believe that these investigations should be continued by all means. The use of fuel is receiving more attention than ever before, and scientific research and investigation has done much in this line as well as other lines that concern practical economic results.

Yours, very truly,

E. C. BROWN, Superintendent.

NEW YORK, May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry of the 26th instant, I take pleasure in saying that I have recently examined the final reports (Professional Paper No. 48) "on fuel investigations during 1904, as a result of a survey of fuels and structural materials, at the testing plant at St. Louis," sufficiently to be impressed by the accomplishments of this testing plant, and am consequently prompted to express the hope, as an interested engineer—a member of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers—that the Senate may act in a way to insure the continuance of these valuable investigations indefinitely.

In my judgment, any appropriation which the Senate may feel disposed to make to this end will be spent to an inestimable advantage.

Very respectfully,

W. W. NICHOLS.

COLONIAL IRON COMPANY,
Riddlesburg, Pa., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry, I beg to state that the investigation of fuels conducted under the direction of the United States Geological Survey at St. Louis during the last two years promises to be of very great value not only to the producer, but also to the consumer of coal and coke. The work already performed has been of considerable value, and it will be a great pity if it should cease.

Only such test can be carried on authoritatively by the Government. There is no private laboratory in existence where such tests can be made, nor would it pay for private parties to establish a plant of this kind; it is too expensive to erect, and requires men of long experience to operate it.

It is a work that the Government can only conduct, and the information and discoveries it will make leading to economy in many directions will add to the material wealth of the country.

Yours, respectfully,

WM. LAUDER, General Manager.

JOHNSTOWN, PA., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As you request an unbiased and independent opinion as to the value and importance of continuing the investigation of fuels, which have been conducted under the Geological Survey at St. Louis during the past two years:

I am deeply interested in this work from the fact of its comprehensive usefulness. It is designed to embrace the scientific and economic study of the several varieties of coals in the United States, exhibiting their relative values for generating steam and for the manufacture of coke.

Only the United States can do this work. It alone can assemble trained scientists to do this testing of coal in an impartial way that will assure general acceptance from the producers and users of coal and its products.

Some isolated determinations have been made by companies and individuals, but these do not command the absolute confidence that the results of the St. Louis coal-testing plant will assure.

With the great expansion of the use of coal—in 1905 364,332,640 net tons—it becomes a matter of the utmost industrial importance to diffuse the knowledge of the adaptability of the several qualities of coal for steam making and for the manufacture of coke and its by-products—ammonia sulphate and tar.

The study of coals for the manufacture of coke is of vital importance from the fact of its rapid expansion and the exhaustion of the fields producing the best coals for coking without preparation by crushing and washing.

We are now in a period in this great manufacture when the several processes for the preparation of the secondary qualities of coal for the production of metallurgical coke is earnestly needed.

During 1904 22,035,292 net tons of coke were produced, requiring 35,256,467 net tons of coal. The years 1905 and 1906 will show a very large expansion of this industry.

The briquetting of coal screenings and of the large fields of lignites will be a most helpful study for this testing plant at St. Louis, and will be largely looked for by the coal producers in the East, and especially in the West.

I feel assured that this testing work is most valuable, as it covers the very genesis of our manufactures in the proper uses of the several varieties of coals, with determinations of the special coals that are adapted for the manufacture of coke.

With the experience already secured at the St. Louis testing plant during the two years of its valuable work, with its well-developed system of testing, it would be a great national loss to have it interrupted until its great industrial mission has been accomplished.

Very truly, yours,

JNO. FULTON, Mining Geologist.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a coal producer, it seems to me important that the investigation of fuels, now being conducted by the Geological Survey at St. Louis, should be continued, and I trust you will favor legislation to this end. It seems to me that it is a matter of importance to all interests consuming coal, that chemical properties of the different coals produced in the United States should be absolutely settled and determined, particularly as the different coals vary so much in their efficiency.

I shall be glad at all times to do what I can to aid in securing the desired legislation.

Very truly, yours, E. R. CHAPMAN.

EDITORIAL ROOMS, THE ENGINEERING MAGAZINE,
New York, May 28, 1906.

Hon. WM. H. WILEY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WILEY: I am writing to you, not only in my own behalf, but in consequence of the opportunity which I have had as editor of the Engineering Magazine of sounding the opinion of the engineering profession in general regarding the great importance to the industries of the United States of the continuance of the work of the fuel-testing board of the Geological Survey so auspiciously commenced at the St. Louis Exposition.

There is no doubt that it would be a national misfortune if anything should occur to prevent the continuance of this important work, while there is no doubt that its completion will add greatly to the wealth of the country by demonstrating the commercial value of fuel deposits hitherto neglected. Already I have had inquiries from abroad regarding the practical developments of the use of lignites and brown coals for the generation of fuel gas, and there is every reason to believe that further developments in these and other valuable results will be extended by the continuance of the work of the board.

It would be a great mistake to cut short in this partially completed condition this investigation already hailed by the engineers of the country with so much satisfaction, and I trust that you will use every effort in your power to have the board continued and the necessary appropriations liberally made.

I am sending you, under another cover, a marked copy of the April issue of the Engineering Magazine, in which reference is made to this subject.

Yours, very truly,

HENRY HARRISON SUPLEE, Editor.

THE UNITED COKE AND GAS COMPANY,

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry, would say we sincerely hope that you can see a way clear to continue the investigations of fuels during the coming year at the St. Louis laboratory. It is scarcely necessary to speak of the advantage of a complete knowledge of our own fuels. The report as far as completed is of great value to us as well as to any other users of coal and its products.

Yours, very truly,

THE UNITED COKE AND GAS COMPANY.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry about the importance of continuing the investigations of fuel, begun at St. Louis under the direction of the Geological Survey, there can be, in my opinion, no doubt about its importance. The results there obtained are already of service to those using coal in manufacturing. As they become known and are carried to an end, will be of more service and be more valued. Hoping that the appropriation for this work will be continued and increased, I am,

Yours, sincerely and respectfully, JNO. WILKES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. WILEY: In reply to your inquiry, I beg to say that the continuance of the fuel investigations by the United States Geological Survey should be of great importance to our people. No one will deny the value of such investigations when properly carried out, while the record of what has already been accomplished by the Survey in this direction shows how well it has been done. Granting all this, is the Government justified in continuing such work?

As you know, I am strongly opposed to the Government undertaking any work which can be done by private enterprise. Private fuel-testing plants already exist, and any coal operator can have his product tested. A testing plant supported by public money should not be permitted to compete with such private work, but what it should and can do is something very different.

"Good wine needs no bush:" prime coal needs no public assistance to demonstrate its qualities. Now, while many sections of our country are blessed with abundant supplies of excellent fuel, the greater part have no other local resources but inferior coals, lignites, or even peats. It is perfectly well known that by proper treatment these inferior fuels can, in the vast majority of cases, be rendered highly efficient, but this knowledge is of little value to the public unless it can be shown that the investigations in any given case give promise of commercial success. To do this requires that the work be done on a scale that no private enterprise would be justified in undertaking. For example, the lignite of a western district, now of little value, might by suitable treatment be made a valuable smelting material, but nobody is sufficiently interested in it to expend the money required to prove this. Peat also can be made far more valuable than most people think, but again there is not enough prospect of private profit.

Of course it must be understood that the work is to be confined to the investigation of the fuel resources of large areas; that it is only to blaze the way and to indicate the direction for profitable individual effort, and that then the Government should cease its action. Congress must determine the advisability of expending public money in this direction, but I feel sure that if the work is properly administered and confined to its legitimate limits the returns will amply justify the expenditure.

Very truly, yours, THOMAS M. CHATARD.

HENRY S. FLEMING, CONSULTING ENGINEER,
New York, May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With reference to the importance of continuing the investigation of fuels and carrying out the proposed investigation of all structural materials, I beg to inclose herewith a copy of a letter which I sent Mr. Walcott, acknowledging the published tests of fuel thus far made and which expresses my opinion of the value of the tests. If there is any way in which I could emphasize what I have said I would like to do so. I have been fortunate enough to receive from the Government very many of its publications and find them all most valuable in my work, and of all of them these fuel tests have a more practical and direct value than any. I heartily hope it may be possible to continue them.

Believe me, sincerely, yours, H. S. FLEMING.

NEW YORK, April 6, 1906.

CHARLES D. WALCOTT,
Director United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of Professional Paper No. 48, parts 1, 2, and 3, for which I thank you heartily. The work which has been done and is recorded in these papers is of the utmost value to every engineer, and, I think, of equal value to all who are engaged in any industry in which coal is used. You have carried out a work which no private individual could have done satisfactorily because both of its extent and that if such work was undertaken by an individual it could not have equal reference value, because whether or not there had been a preference shown for any coal or sample of coal the inclination would be to believe there had, and thus throw a shadow over the results given.

I so heartily appreciate the exceeding value of the data presented in these reports that I am at a loss to know how to express my acknowledgments and my earnest hope is that nothing may be allowed to interfere with the plans of your department for carrying out tests of structural materials. It is impossible for a layman to understand how essential it is for an engineer to have reference data covering every class of material and made by unbiased investigators. Without it we are compelled to rely largely on tests published in the transactions of the various societies, which have not the scope of yours.

I do not know of anything which is a more important aid to the industrial development of this country than the work your department is doing, and it is my earnest hope nothing may be allowed to interfere with your progress in these directions.

Believe me, sincerely, yours, ———— ————.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., May 28, 1906.

Hon. W. H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington D. C.

DEAR SIR: At your request for the writer's opinion regarding the importance of continuing the investigation of fuels, which has been conducted under the Geological Survey at St. Louis during the past two years, I gladly respond, and would ask you to accept—as fully stating my views—a copy of my letter to our Congressman, Hon. M. E. DRISCOLL. I would like to add that since writing that letter to Congressman DRISCOLL and one also to Congressman DENBY (of Michigan), as well as bringing the same to the attention of Senators PLATT and DEPEW, I have conversed with a number of gentlemen who are deeply interested in mines and manufactures, and gathered from the conversations that all were unanimous in their opinion as to its being one of the best investments the United States Government could make at this time.

Trusting the inclosure will serve the purpose intended, I beg to remain,

Yours, respectfully, J. WM. SMITH,
Assistant General Manager the Solvay Process Company.

Heartily approved.

W. B. COGSWELL,
Vice-President and Managing Director.

Extracts from letters of prominent engineers and others.

No investigations have been undertaken in recent years by the Government that have such immediate and striking importance and bearing on the proper utilization of raw materials as the fuel tests now being conducted at St. Louis.

R. N. DICKMAN,
Dickman & Mackenzie, Mining Engineers, Assayers, Chemists, and Metallurgists, Chicago, Ill.

We are most emphatically in favor of the appropriation. There is very meager information available concerning the values of the various fuels, except what can be learned from the producers, and the great variance in the tests, which are often made with incomplete facilities, have rendered same uncertain and unreliable. We hope the work will be allowed to progress, as the increasing knowledge of the values and uses of our fuels is adding greatly to the wealth of the country.

JAMES W. ELLSWORTH & CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio.

The investigation of fuels and structural materials by the Government have called forth a widespread interest among members of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, and I am sure that they are of very great importance to the country.

F. W. TAYLOR,
President American Society of Mechanical Engineers, Philadelphia, Pa.

I consider this a very valuable work which should be continued. It will be of the utmost importance to the country generally.

KARL EILERS,
American Smelters Securities Company, Salt Lake City, Utah.

I trust you will at all times bear in mind our desire to render you any assistance in our power in connection with this most important work.

JAS. J. HILL,
President Great Northern Railway Company, St. Paul, Minn.

I can not too strongly emphasize the importance of the work. It should be of the greatest value not only to the metallurgical, but to all the other manufacturing and the transportation industries of the country who have these data as to fuels.

HENRY M. HOWE,
Professor, School of Mines, Columbian Univeristy, New York.
(The most eminent steel metallurgist in the United States.)

I am heartily in favor of the continuance of the investigations, and consider the work already done on the subject of fuels to be of the greatest value to engineers and manufacturers and to all interested in fuel economy.

WM. H. KAVANAUGH,
Assistant Professor Mechanical Engineering, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, Minn.

I am greatly interested in the work that the United States Geological Survey has been doing at St. Louis during the past three years. I sincerely hope that the Congress now in session will see fit to not only enlarge the scope of the work, but will support the undertaking liberally in a financial way. The work already done is of great value.

S. W. BEYER,
Department of Geology and Mining Engineering, Iowa State College, Ames, Iowa.

This work of investigation of fuels and structural materials is valuable, and should by all means be continued.

W. A. LATHROP,
President Pennsylvania Coal and Coke Company, Philadelphia, Pa.

We believe it to be a very important matter that Congress should make the necessary appropriation to carry on the investigation of fuel and structural materials.

PICKANDS, MATHER & CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio.

As an architect, I desire to express my view as to the great importance and value of a thorough and systematic Government investigation of the strengths and other properties of building materials, and trust that Congress will not fail to make the modest appropriation asked for that purpose.

WM. G. OSGOOD,
Boston, Mass.

I deeply appreciate the importance of this work being continued, and it would be impossible for anyone to overestimate the value which continued investigation would mean to this nation.

J. WM. SMITH,
SEMET SOLVAY COMPANY,
Syracuse, N. Y.

I can not find terms strong enough to express my approval of this project. The wonder is that this work has not been done long ago and that it is not being done on a larger scale.

A. O. ELZNER,
Secretary Cincinnati Chapter, American Institute of Architects, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The continuance of these investigations ought to be provided for by Congress, and the appropriations estimated for the next fiscal year ought certainly to pass.

AMERICAN METAL COMPANY (LIMITED),
J. LANGELOTH, President.

I thoroughly believe that this work should be continued. It is of inestimable value to the coal-using industries of the country.

G. W. BISSELL,
Professor Mechanical Engineering, Iowa State College, Ames, Iowa.

I consider the work of vast importance to the commercial world and feel sure that it should, if possible, be continued.

NEW YORK EDISON COMPANY,
JAS. D. ANDREWS, Chief Engineer,
55 Duane Street, New York.

I believe these investigations will be of great benefit to the engineering fraternity of the country.

JOS. H. AMES,
Chief Engineer American Car and Foundry Company, Lincoln Trust Building, St. Louis, Mo.

The importance of this work from an economic standpoint can scarcely be estimated. It reaches into all departments of industry where the question of fuel and power enters. The investigation is in the right direction, and we trust it will be continued.

E. C. BROWN,
Superintendent Beach Creek Coal and Coke Company, Patton, Cambria County, Pa.

I regard the work done at the fuel-testing station as of the greatest possible value to all fuel users.

ALBERT A. CARY,
Member, A. S. M. E., etc., Mechanical Engineer, New York.

The work is of the greatest importance to the architectural profession, and I sincerely hope it may be continued.

F. W. CHANDLER,
Professor of Architecture, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston, Mass.

This is an extremely valuable work, which can not fail to be of benefit to the entire country.

F. K. COPELAND,
President Sullivan Machinery Company, Chicago, Ill.

The tests are carefully made, and the results are invaluable and are accepted as standard.

S. E. FAIRCHILD, Jr.,
Fairchild & Gilchrist, Civil and Mining Engineers, Philadelphia, Pa.

Am greatly impressed with the value of this testing work, in its bearing on coals and cokes. This testing can be conducted only by the Government, with its qualified agents and ample resources.

JOHN FULTON,
Mining Geologist, Johnstown, Pa.

I hope the work will be continued and extended in its range. I can think of no more valuable and immediately useful service that the Survey could render the people of the United States than the continuance of this very successful work on fuels, etc.

R. D. GEORGE,
Professor of Geology, University of Colorado, Boulder, Colo.

I have not seen anything before in the nature of investigation which has been as thorough and complete as these investigations are.

W. P. HANCOCK,
Superintendent Generating Department, Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston, Boston, Mass.

I hope the investigations will be continued. The United States is the only prominent coal-producing country that has no adequate knowledge of the properties of its fuels. The classifications based upon European data do not fit the great variety of our coals. Single States have done sporadic work to meet a few local industrial demands, but the question as a whole can be solved only by the General Government.

H. O. HOFMAN,
Professor of Metallurgy, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston, Mass.

The work of this department of the Geological Survey is of the greatest value to the engineers of the country, and I heartily recommend that the laboratories be continued with the fullest facilities.

ABRAM T. BALDWIN,
Syracuse, N. Y.

It is hoped that Congress may make the needed appropriations to continue these investigations.

RICKETTS & BANKS,
Per JOHN H. BANKS.
Ricketts & Banks, Chemists, Assayers and Mining Engineers, 104 John street, New York.

I am very much interested in this work and hope that liberal appropriations may be made for its continuance. The results will be of great interest to the country.

S. H. BROCKMEIR,
Mining Engineer for United States Brick Company, Catskill, N. Y.

Any investigation along lines that will teach economy in the value of fuels and structural materials, and especially any investigation of a local character, will undoubtedly prove of much benefit. Its economic importance can hardly be overestimated.

A. G. BROWNLEE,
President and General Manager Stanley Mines Company, Idaho Springs, Colo.

The question of comparative fuel values and the best methods of utilizing the different kinds of fuels is a matter of vital importance to everyone engaged in mining and the production and use of power, and the cost of such investigations is altogether too great to be borne by any one concern. Nor would the results receive the credence that would be given to results obtained under an independent national advisory board.

S. W. BRUNTON,
The Taylor & Brunton Ore Sampling Co., Salt Lake City, Utah; The Taylor & Brunton Sampling Co., Victor, Colo., etc.

I sincerely hope Congress will see fit to extend the appropriations to enable the work to be carried to completion. The results obtained will be of material advantage.

V. Z. CABARRISTI,
Shop Engineer, American Locomotive Works, Richmond, Va.

The work will be of very great value, particularly to all interests producing or consuming fuel. It seems to me there ought to be no question of the propriety of the extension of this work for the next fiscal year.

S. R. CHAPMAN,
President Chapman Iron, Coal, and Coke Co., 80 Broadway, New York.

The testing of fuels and structural materials is of great importance to both manufacturer and builder. The enormous waste through ignorance of material used can be largely overcome by a scientific knowledge of these matters. I add my word of enthusiastic support of this work.

W. M. CHAUVENET,
Regis Chauvenet & Bro., Mining Engineers, Analytical Chemists, etc., St. Louis, Mo.

Such investigations are of the highest utility to engineers having charge of industrial operations, and I hope that Congress may supply abundant funds for the prosecution of these tests. May I suggest that the extension of the fuel tests to the classification of crude oils for use in gas engines would yield very important results?

COURTENAY DE KALB,
Consulting Engineer, Exposed Treasure Mining Co., of Mojave, Cal. New York Office, 26 Liberty Street, New York.

I am strongly in favor of a continuance of the investigations, and hope Congress may provide for an enlargement of their scope.

HENRY S. FLEMING,
Consulting Engineer, New York.

I desire to commend in the highest possible terms the work that is being done in the investigation of fuels and structural materials at this testing plant at St. Louis, and hope its great importance may be fully realized and that it may be continued for the good of the whole country.

GRANBY MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY,
St. Louis, Mo.,
Per ELIAS S. GATCH, President.

It is hoped these investigations will be continued under competent engineers, those who are in position to give an unbiased opinion. Our country should have better facilities for obtaining a knowledge of the materials used in engineering work. The expense of conducting a testing laboratory by manufacturing establishments is a great one. The means placed at the command of the German manufacturers by which results may be obtained at a slight cost is adding much to the competition with which American engineers have to contend.

ALBERT F. HALL,
Member A. S. M. E., Associate Member Institute Civil Engineers, England; Member Society Engineers in Germany.

I consider the investigations which your Bureau is carrying on of the greatest value to engineers and the engineering industries.

J. H. HOFFMAN,
Hoffman Engineering and Construction Company, Philadelphia, Pa.

As a member of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, I wish to express my interest in the work that is being done in the investigation of fuels. I hope the appropriation for the continuance of the work may be obtained.

MAURICE HOOPES,
Glens Falls, N. Y.

The work of the coal-testing plant is of vital interest to the Engineers' Club. It is the desire of our organization to further the operations of the plant and the extension of their scope, and it was in order that we might do so intelligently and in a manner to be of the greatest usefulness to the public and to the plant that we appointed a committee which we regard as representative of the highest ideals of the Engineers' Club.

W. A. LAYMAN,
President Engineers' Club of St. Louis, St. Louis, Mo.

The influence of the published reports on fuel testing has been great. Even in the clay industries, in which I am particularly interested, in which the waste of fuel is proportionately greater than in any other industry, and which is slowest to take up advanced ideas, the report has had its effect.

Gas producers were eagerly discussed at the recent conventions of the American Ceramic Society and the National Brick Makers' Association, and a number of plants are putting them in. I sincerely hope the work will be continued and extended as proposed.

ELLIS LOVEJOY,
Member American Ceramic Society, and of American Institute of Mining Engineers, Columbus, Ohio.

I trust that Congress will make liberal appropriations for the continuance of the investigations of fuels and structural materials, as this work is of the greatest importance to the country at large.

W. S. LYSLE, E. M.,
Rochester, N. Y.

I trust that the Survey may receive from Congress that recognition which the importance of the work well deserves.

ANDREW S. MCCREATH,
Commissioner.
ANDREW S. MCCREATH & SON,
Harrisburg, Pa.

I believe that the investigations should be pushed energetically.

W. T. MAGRUDER,
Professor Mechanical Engineering, Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio.

I shall endeavor to impress upon our Representatives the importance of the work and the fact that they should evince a larger interest therein.

W. F. R. MILLS,
General Manager, Mining Reporter, Denver, Colo.

I wish to express the hope as an interested engineer and a member of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, that the Senate may be sufficiently impressed by the accomplishments of this testing plant and the importance of its investigations to be willing to defray the expenses of such investigations by appropriations to be repeated indefinitely. In my estimation it will be money spent to inestimable advantage.

W. W. NICHOLS,
Allis-Chalmers Company, New York City.

I hope there can be no question of stopping appropriations for the very valuable work of the Geological Survey in testing fuels and building materials which has given us not only the best, but, in many cases, the only authoritative data on these subjects and greatly added in the economical use of building materials.

R. V. NORRIS,
Consulting Engineer, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

I have been informed of some move to discontinue the investigations of fuels and structural materials in the Survey. Please advise if I have not been misinformed. Surely no one would curtail the work of the Survey of such great importance as this if they appreciate the immense value of it to the mining public.

S. W. OSGOOD,
Chicago, Ill.

The importance of providing for the continuance of this desirable work is of such moment that I sincerely hope that the appropriation necessary for this purpose may be made by Congress.

CHARLES SCHUCHERT,
Curator Yale University Museum, New Haven, Conn.

Our company is very much interested in an appropriation for the continuance of the investigations of structural materials.

S. H. BASSETT,
President The Iola Portland Cement Company, Iola, Kans.

We are greatly interested in this work, and trust that the Government will see the advantage of providing funds for its continuance. The cement industry in particular has grown so enormously that we believe the Government alone can correct the tremendous amount of misinformation that has grown up respecting the use of cement.

H. J. SEAMAN,
General Superintendent Atlas Portland Cement Company, Northampton, Pa.

We desire to express our hope that the investigations of the fuel and structural materials may be continued by the United States Geological Survey. There is a great need of such investigation concerning the efficiency of various fuels and the strength of various materials entering into construction, and such information will be of great value to the manufacturers and engineers of this country.

FRANK E. SHEPARD,
The Denver Engineering Works Company, Denver, Colo.

"Resolved, That we, the National Association of Cement Users, in convention assembled at Milwaukee, Wis., deem the investigation of cement, mortars, and other structural materials now being conducted by the United States Geological Survey of so far-reaching importance to the people of the country that we respectfully ask the Congress of the United States to make large provision for the continuance of this important work on a more extensive scale."

The foregoing resolution was passed by the National Association of Cement Users on January 10, 1906.

RICHARD L. HUMPHREY,
President National Association of Cement Users, Philadelphia, Pa.

This work that is being done is of great assistance to all those engaged in work along these lines. It is to be hoped that the Senate will pass a resolution allowing this work to go on.

R. A. WEDDIEOMBE,
Kroeschell Bros. Boiler and Steel Fitting Works, Chicago, Ill.

From the intimate knowledge of the thoroughness and care with which the fuel tests are conducted at St. Louis, I sincerely hope that this work will be continued through a new Congressional appropriation. The results thus far obtained are of inestimable value, and it would be a grave misfortune if this work can not be continued.

H. A. WHEELER, St. Louis, Mo.

This work is of great public benefit, and I hope Congress will not cripple nor curtail the work of the Geological Survey, but will favor the continuance or expansion of the same.

EDWIN L. WILES,
Stony Point, N. Y.

I trust that Congress will make appropriations for the continuance of the investigation of fuels and structural materials.

JOHN WILKES,
Manager Mecklenburg Iron Works, Charlotte, N. C.

So far as I can judge, the results obtained are of great value and the investigation should be continued.

HENRY J. WILLIAMS,
Boston, Mass.

I would urge you to do all in your power to get sufficient funds appropriated to continue this work, as it is of great importance and much benefit will be derived from a continuancce of these tests and investigations.

B. N. WILSON,
Professor of Mechanical Engineering,
University of Arkansas, Fayette, Ark.

I consider this report of extreme value and should regret to learn that it is to be discontinued.

R. S. PERRY,
President and General Manager Harrison Brothers & Co. (Inc.), Philadelphia, Pa.

I desire to say it is my opinion that these investigations are very useful and should be continued. I believe the money is well spent which it costs to make them, and I hope Congress will make the necessary appropriation for the next fiscal year.

ERSKINE RAMSAY,
Vice-President Pratt Consolidated Coal Company,
Birmingham, Ala.

It is my hope that Congress will permit the continued work of the Survey on fuel investigations. The information that has been obtained by the tests at St. Louis have been of great commercial value.

GEORGE S. RICE,
Mining Engineer, Chicago, Ill.

I trust that the value of the work of the plant at St. Louis will be made apparent to Congress and that ample appropriations for the purpose will insure the continuation of the work for some time to come.

F. SCHNEIWIND,
The United Coke and Gas Company,
New York City.

I am very much interested in the work which has been conducted at St. Louis during the past year and believe that Congress should appropriate sufficient funds to continue the work on a larger scale.

M. S. SHERMAN,
Superintendent Sement-Solvay Co.,
Ensley, Ala.

I am impressed very favorably with the idea that the investigation of fuels and structural materials by the United States Geological Survey should be continued.

A. M. SHOOK,
Nashville, Tenn.

We believe that many and great benefits will accrue to the American people by a more general understanding of the scientific principles upon which the economical use of fuel is based.

J. D. SKINNER,
President The Northern Coal and Coke Company,
Denver, Colo.

I sincerely hope that the Government may make appropriations so that this exceedingly valuable work may continue.

ALBERT W. SMITH,
Director Sibley College, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.

I consider the continuance of the investigation of fuels and structural materials by the Geological Survey to be of vital importance to the United States in general.

J. A. SNEDAKER,
Mining Engineer, Denver, Colo.

I am in favor of the continuance of the work of testing fuels and structural materials.

H. H. SUPLEE,
Editor The Engineering Magazine, New York City.

I am satisfied that the work of testing fuels and structural materials by the National Government can be made of great value to the people, and I am in favor of having the organization made permanent, with sufficient appropriations granted to obtain the service of the right kind of men.

R. M. TARLETON,
New York City.

Among the engineers who are familiar with what is being done at the testing plant at St. Louis this is regarded as the most important work that the Government has undertaken, and one which not only gives valuable scientific information, but will bring the greatest practical good to the country. I wish to add my commendation of the work.

ARTHUR THACHER, E. M.,
St. Louis, Mo.

We are very much interested in these investigations and think they will be useful not only to us, but to the community at large.

E. N. TRUMP,
General Manager The Solvay Process Co., Syracuse N. Y.

I warmly indorse the work of your Department and trust Congress may provide for a continuance of the investigations.

EDWARD V. D'INVILLIERS,
Geologist and Mining Engineer, Philadelphia, Pa.

The work is proving of much value to the industries of the country.

JOHN P. JACKSON,
Professor of Electrical Engineering,
Pennsylvania State College, State College, Pa.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 19642. An act to regulate the keeping of employment agencies in the District of Columbia where fees are charged for procuring employment or situations.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3413. An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and repealing sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the United States Revised Statutes.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For topographical surveys in various portions of the United States, $300,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order to that paragraph.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 75, line 20, amend by adding, after the word "hundred," the words "and fifty."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as pending and read for the information of the committee in the time of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply restores the appropriation to the amount in the current law, $350,000. I think it is not necessary to impress upon the members of the House the relative importance of topographic surveys among the whole work of the Geological Survey. It is such work as is preliminary to much of the other work of that Survey. All investigations of mineral resources, of forest resources, of soil survey, made by the Department of Agriculture and various other works are dependent upon the preliminary topographic maps made by the Geological Survey. It is naturally important, therefore, that the topographic survey should precede and be largely in advance of the other work of the service. There is now no such advance as will justify Congress in curtailing this appropriation, and therefore curtailing the work. There is no more popular feature of the work of the Geological Survey than that involved in this paragraph. Demands have come from every State and Territory in the Union, and as the director in his report says, a much larger sum than that contained in the current appropriation and that which is intended by this amendment could be utilized and then the wishes of the country, as reflected by their Representatives here, not be met. I take it, therefore, it is unnecessary to take up the time of the House in any discussion of the merits of this amendment, the only purpose of which is to make the appropriation equal to the appropriation in the current law, $350,000, instead of $300,000, as reported by the committee and contained in the bill.

Mr. McKINLAY of California rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that a point of order is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is reserved against the paragraph. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] offered an amendment, which was read in his time, but which would of course not be considered as pending until the point of order reserved by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was determined.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it in order to demand that the point of order be made or withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then I shall insist that the point be made or withdrawn. This may go out on a point of order, and we would like to have the Chair's ruling upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state, however, to the gentleman from Kentucky that before his point was made and while the point of order was pending the Chair had recognized the gentleman from California [Mr. McKINLAY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. In the event that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] withdraws his point of order to the paragraph, does the point of order still lie to the amendment which I have reserved, which amendment was offered by the gentleman from North Carolina?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again state that under the parliamentary situation the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina was simply read in his time and is not now pending.

Mr. TAWNEY. What I want to ascertain is whether in the event of the withdrawal of the point of order to the paragraph I can then insist upon my point of order as against the amendment increasing the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the gentleman from Minnesota can make the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the point of order lie?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The amendment simply increases the amount.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, the only way in which we can avoid this would be to have a ruling on the point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Chair if I understood the Chair aright in stating that the point of order had to be made or withdrawn whenever the regular order was called for?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but the Chair understood the gentleman from Kentucky to rise to a parliamentary inquiry or to make a point of order, and before he made the point or rose to a parliamentary inquiry the Chair had recognized the gentleman from California for five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no desire to take the gentleman off his feet.

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Mr. Chairman, all that portion of the sundry civil bill dealing with the appropriations for the maintenance of the Geological Bureau is of vital importance to the entire State of California, but particularly so to that region of the State occupied by the valleys of the San Joaquin and Sacramento rivers.

This section of the bill is peculiarly important to northern California, because of the fact that the items of this portion of the bill have been cut down far below the estimates of the Bureau of Geological Survey, the item of appropriation for topographical work alone having been scaled by the committee $100,000. This item, at least, we contend should be raised in the bill, so that it shall read $400,000 instead of $300,000.

I firmly believe that if the Members of this House will give some consideration to the magnitude and importance of the work now being carried on in all sections of the United States by this very efficient and useful department of the Government, they will come to the same conclusion I have—that the increase of this item, which is now $300,000, to $400,000 is not too much to ask for and expect to receive.

Gentlemen, the work of this Department of the Government is not confined to any one State nor any one section. Every State and Territory of the Union is being surveyed and studied, and in a measure developed by the engineers and scientists of the Geological Bureau. Therefore every Member of the House is interested in having sufficient funds placed at the disposal of the Director of this Bureau for the aggressive continuance of the work now being prosecuted under his direction.

The restoration of all the amounts cut from the estimates of Mr. Walcott is not too much to ask for, for the restoration of those amounts means the continuance in an efficient way of geological survey, topographical survey, stream measurement, and chemical and physical research relative to geology, in all parts of the Republic.

The engineers and scientific men of this Bureau are now scattered over the entire area of the country. They are doing good, valuable work, work that must be done before the lands in the various States and Territories still in the ownership of the Federal Government shall be ready for settlement, occupation, or sale, as the case may be, under the various laws by the provisions of which the public lands may be acquired by private persons.

It is not as though the Geological Bureau were asking increased funds to experiment with along new lines. The lines of work of the Geological Bureau are already set. Their plans have been in operation for years and are still under way, and all the Bureau asks is that that work shall be continued along the lines projected.

Now, as this is a necessary work, useful and profitable to every State of the Union, it should be indorsed, supported, and encouraged by every Member of this House. And the only way this can be done is by the restoration to the sundry civil bill the amounts scaled down from the estimate of the Bureau.

Last year the approved estimates of the Bureau amounted to $350,000, and that was almost an insufficient amount to meet the demands upon the Bureau; and the demands are daily increasing rather than diminishing, so that to keep pace with those increasing demands, to continue the work falling under the supervision of the Geological Bureau and maintain it in its old ratio in proportion to the calls upon the Bureau from many new quarters, it is necessary that the amount the Bureau should have placed at its disposal this year should be $400,000.

Now, the reduction of the fund for topographical survey works a peculiar hardship at this time upon northern California, throughout all the region drained by the San Joaquin and Sacramento rivers, for in those regions topographic, hydrographic, and geological work have been carried on for some years. Reconnoissance surveys have been made over almost the entire extent of the two river basins, and working surveys already extend over a great portion of the Sacramento basin, and the continued prosecution and quick completion of those surveys means everything to the district I have the honor to represent.

Now, gentlemen, do not assume that if the sum of $100,000 is restored to this item of the sundry civil bill it all goes to northern California, or even to all California. The portion of the entire amount which will go to California will be about twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars, the remainder of the amount being divided up among other States. Texas, Georgia, Illinois, New York, Ohio, Montana, Washington, Oregon, and, in fact, every State in which geological work is being prosecuted will share with California.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman how he knows $20,000 of that will go to California?

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Because last year about $20,000 of the fund was expended and this year, I think, $15,000, and I am basing my estimate of $20,000 for the future year's work upon the amount which has been expended in the past.

But the peculiar hardship to California arising out of the scaling down of the estimates of the Bureau comes from the fact that the surveys in the valleys of California are nearly completed. One more year's work will finish them. The twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars which would be apportioned to our State, when supplemented by a like sum furnished by California herself, would be sufficient to bring to a successful conclusion an all-important work—a work the completion of which means everything to that portion of our State.

This work of the Geological Bureau throughout our valleys has been varied, extensive, and very necessary.

The hydrographic work now in progress in those valleys consists of stream gauging, the study of underground waters, the study of the quality of the water, and the study of the débris problem and its relation to hydraulic mining. And let me say in passing that the débris problem was, and is, one of the most disturbing questions that has ever agitated California, and a question that is still far from settlement or solution.

The topographic work is in the nature of the location and survey of irrigation reservoir sites, drainage and irrigation canal courses, location of storage basins for waste waters, and all such necessary work as must be done in the preparation of vast and comparatively little understood tracts of land, when preparing them for successful cultivation under a proposed irrigation system.

The continuance of this work is most necessary. Why, its cessation would be a calamity to the State of California; not only that, but it would be against the interests of the people of the whole country to have this work terminated.

Perhaps this may seem like an extravagant statement, but consider the facts. Although the work I have indicated is being carried on within the State lines of California, nevertheless the Federal Government still owns over 10 per cent of all the lands lying in the counties of Tehama, Lake, Glenn, Colusa, and Yolo, on the west side of the Sacramento River. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government still owns or controls more than half of the lands within the entire area of the State of California.

That magnificent empire of the Pacific slope, containing 99,000,000 acres of land, twelve hundred miles of seaboard—if the indentations of the coast are followed—the greatest harbor in all the world, unbounded resources, and endless possibilities of industry, commerce, manufacture, and productive enterprise of every description, one-half of all this is still in the ownership or under the control of the General Government of the United States.

To whose interest and advantage is it, then, that the work of surveying, studying, planning for, and understanding California shall be continued? To California alone? No. It is to the interest and advantage of all the people—the whole people of the whole country.

Far too great a portion of the public domain—the people's land—has already been thoughtlessly, ignorantly, and wantonly conveyed away. Lands containing vast deposits of minerals of untold value; lands covered with tracts of timber of almost fabulous price; lands possessed of water, springs, and streams of incalculable value; lands upon which reservoir sites and rapids suitable for the generation of power are located by nature have been recklessly given to persons and corporations for but a fraction of their value, because the Government itself did not know the value of the rich agencies of wealth and usefulness it was scattering with a far too lavish hand.

But the General Government has at last turned over a new leaf in this respect, and it wants to know all about its possessions. It wants to know the value of the land, the water, the timber, the minerals, and even the sands, rocks, and climate it intends to hereafter dispose of. And so that it may understand all these things, so that a fund of all such information shall be easily available, the Geological Bureau has been intrusted with the work of gathering information of every nature, information equally valuable to the Government and the private citizen.

Now, that is the work that the Geological Bureau is carrying on not only in California, but all over the country, and the work which we Californians protest against bringing to even a partial conclusion for the want of sufficient funds to bring it to a thorough completion.

Nor has California been backward on her part. She has year by year appropriated sums to be spent in equal amount to that spent by the Federal Government within her boundaries, all sums, both State and Federal, being expended by the United States officials for the carrying forward of Geological Bureau work of every description. Last year she contributed twenty thousand, this year fifteen, in cooperation with the Federal Government, and I am sure she will continue to meet every requirement of the work of the Geological Bureau, so necessary to her development.

So much has been done already of usefulness and profit by the cooperation of State and nation—so much toward the solution of the drainage problem, the irrigation problem, the débris problem—that it would be a shame and disgrace to both State and nation if all this important work should be suspended, the engineers recalled, the scientific men withdrawn, the records, plans and specifications shelved away to molder and be forgotten, and all the work fall into desuetude for the want of a few paltry thousand dollars, which here and now should be restored to the sundry civil bill. And if this should be done—as it ought to be done—be assured of this, Mr. Chairman, that California on her part will pay back to the General Government in the saving of future expense and in the profits of enlarged opportunities $10 for every one she shall receive.

The maintenance of the navigability of the Sacramento River has been for many years a large item of expense which the Federal Government has been compelled to consider. Congress after Congress has been importuned by California Members to grant moneys for the purpose of dredging bars, removing shoals and other obstructions, building weirs and wing dams, so that a reasonable state of navigability might be maintained along the course of this the great artery of northern California's inland commerce, and on the whole Congress has reasonably responded to the solicitations of California along this line.

But notwithstanding the large sums expended, despite the fact that great improvements have been made in the river course as a result of these expenditures, the problem of the control and reclamation of the Sacramento River is still a most vital question, affecting all the valley territory extending from Suisun Bay to the mountain slopes at the head of navigation north of the town of Red Bluff, a distance of over 250 miles.

To understand the intricacies of the Sacramento River problem of the present it is necessary to be acquainted with the fact that in Argonaut days navigation was comparatively easy and unimpeded along the entire river course from its mouth to the mountain rapids. In those days the Sacramento was the highway of northern California commerce and the chief agency for the distribution of people, products, and merchandise to all parts of that section of the State. Old settlers still remember when ocean-going vessels were tied to Sacramento city docks, and cargoes loaded or unloaded that found a passage "round the Horn."

But the use of the hydraulic monitor in mining operations in the foothills of California soon began to fill the tributary streams with refuse and débris of the mines, and this, being carried by currents and floods, found its way to the mother stream, and in time began to change the whole character of the water courses impregnated with it. Great deposits of débris began to fill the beds of the streams and find lodgment against obstructions, forming bars, shoals, and islands, and in many places completely changing the topography of the country.

The Federal Government finally found it necessary to prohibit hydraulic mining, but the prohibition in a great measure came too late. The Sacramento River was almost ruined as a navigable river, and all the tributaries entirely so. The Yuba, the Feather, and the American rivers, emptying into the Sacramento, became almost worthless from a navigable standpoint.

The filling up of the beds of the streams caused, of course, an increased danger of overflow in time of high water. A great danger to life and property each year arose from this changing condition of river and streams. To offset the growing tendency to inundation the landowners along the banks of the streams were compelled to build levees to confine the waters, and this levee building has never ceased to this hour. The work has gone on year after year, the rivers filling, the levees growing higher and higher, and each year the danger of winter's floods increasing. As a result of this filling and building, in places the beds of streams are 12 and 15 feet higher than the adjacent fields.

This condition might not be so very alarming in a sparsely settled country, but the rich lands of the Sacramento River bottom are attracting a large and ever-increasing population, and consequently year by year the menace to life and property along the Sacramento increases.

The Federal Government has taken cognizance of these conditions, and, I believe, at times has even stretched a point in the way of making liberal appropriations for maintaining the navigability of the river, in order that incidentally such work might be done in the expenditure of the appropriation as would tend to mitigate the evils arising out of the river's impairment by the mining débris.

In 1904 a serious break of the levee, just below the city of Sacramento, permitted the inundation of nearly 60 miles of lands, a great portion of which were under cultivation, and as a result fully $10,000,000 worth of property was destroyed.

Both the State of California and the Federal Government have been working for years upon various plans to eradicate the evils growing out of the tendency of the Sacramento River to overflow its banks. Commissions of engineers have been appointed by both Federal and State governments to study the problem and, if possible, formulate a plan whereby the evils might be overcome.

A very comprehensive plan has been outlined by a commission appointed a few years ago, and in all probability, if the details of that plan could be successfully worked out, the Sacramento River could be confined within its banks, and incidentaly great tracts of overflowed lands drained and brought into a condition fit for cultivation, but the completion of the work under that plan would require an expenditure of $24,000,000. And at the present time neither the State of California nor the landholders of the valley are in a position to expend the amounts which would fall to their respective lots to pay, even if the Federal Government would cooperate with the State of California and the landholders in carrying out the plans of the engineers.

Meanwhile the people of that great valley are in constant apprehension that each recurring winter's floods will sweep away the levees and carry death and destruction to thousands of homes.

Now, strange to say, the passage of the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, came as a star of promise to the people of the Sacramento Valley. Under the provisions of that act a fund should be created out of the proceeds of the sale of public lands, this fund to be expended in the building of storage dams, irrigation canals, and ditches, by means of which the waters of winter might be impounded and stored till the season of summer and then distributed to the thirsty lands within the limits of irrigation districts.

Although the provisions of this act were intended to apply primarily to arid lands in Government ownership, still the scope of the law was not absolutely confined to Government lands. Under its provisions private owners of lands, under the direction of the Reclamation Service Bureau, may dedicate their lands in acreages not to exceed 160 acres by each owner to an irrigation district corporation, and if an aggregate expanse sufficiently large is so dedicated to the corporation, the Secretary of the Interior may cause to be built suitable storage reservoirs and canals and furnish water to the members of the district corporation, the money advanced by the Government to become a lien upon the land of the district until paid, which payment may be made in ten yearly installments, the works then to become the property of the district corporation. In this way, under the provisions of the reclamation act, it is designed that the reclamation fund shall become a revolving fund, and decade after decade perform its beneficent purpose.

Now, the people of the Sacramento Valley were quick to perceive the possibilities of this wise law; perhaps their perception was quickened by the fact that long since much of their land has become partially exhausted from successive years of wheat raising. Year by year the yield has been decreasing, until in many sections the annual return of the land when planted to wheat is not sufficient to maintain the landowner.

So from every part of that great valley a desire was expressed that irrigation be inaugurated under the provisions of the reclamation law.

Students of the river problem saw in the possibility of irrigation under the reclamation law a practical solution of the river problem. With the construction of storage dams on the courses of the various streams emptying into the Sacramento River engineers saw the possibility of holding back a great portion of the flood waters in time of excess and gradually letting them escape as the river flow subsided; then, as the months of drought approached, permitting the reservoirs to fill for the purpose of storing the water for use in irrigation.

Therefore the development of the irrigation systems, the regulation of flood waters, and the drainage and reclamation of land will insure the comparatively easy preservation of the navigability of the Sacramento River. After the passage of the reclamation law the engineers of the Reclamation Service, in making reconnoissance surveys over California, discovered the immense possibilities of the Sacramento from the irrigation standpoint, and every succeeding day's study of that remarkable valley more strongly confirmed the opinion that the Sacramento Basin is the most promising field for successful irrigation operations in the whole United States.

So enthusiastic are the Government officers engaged in surveying the Sacramento Valley that they are very anxious to complete the necessary work, so that very soon the entire valley shall be prepared for the formation of irrigation districts and the prosecution of work under the reclamation law.

The great Sacramento Valley is 400 miles in length and has an average width of about 40 miles. It has an area of more than two and a half million acres, all of which is susceptible of some degree of irrigation, and this vast tract of most fertile land as yet contains a population of much less than a half million people.

The records of the census of 1900 show that this Nile Valley of California produces more than 80 per cent of the wheat crop of the State, more than 60 per cent of the barley, 57 per cent of the onions, and 55 per cent of the potatoes. This valley raises citrus fruits, deciduous fruits, and grapes. In fact, all products of the temperate and semitropic climates are there grown.

This wonderful valley, even under partial irrigation, within twenty years should furnish homes and plenty to more than 5,000,000 souls. Already the progressive citizens in the vicinity of the thriving town of Orland, in Glenn County, have caught the spirit of progress and have organized themselves into an irrigation district, known as the "Orland Water Users' Association." They have dedicated sufficient land to meet the requirements of the reclamation law, and under the direction of a former Member of this House, who was, as well, a member of the Irrigation Committee, the Orland association is endeavoring to proceed according to the plan outlined in that act. They are endeavoring, by the timely use of water, to save their lands and their homes to themselves and their children, and in doing so they are furnishing a valuable example to the people of other semiarid districts, that will, without doubt, be most profitable for them to follow.

But the necessary surveys are as yet incomplete. The plans, the specifications, and the estimates are as yet unfinished, and the Geological Bureau asks funds to complete the work. Without sufficient funds—yes, even without the additional $100,000 we are now importuning the House to add to the estimate of the committee for topographical survey—the work of completing the plans must cease, at least till a more generous House will furnish the means to meet the requirements of the situation.

But surely the plea of the Geological Bureau and of the people of California will be granted and their hope not denied. This Congress, which gave most generously when unparalleled disaster devastated California, will not close its hand in a sudden paroxysm of false economy, and, in order to recoup liberality in other places, bring to a standstill even a portion of the work now being carried on under the direction of the Geological Bureau in the Sacramento Valley.

Let me say again, in conclusion, this is a whole United States project—this mapping out, surveying, and preparing for irrigation the California lands. It is a work which vitally concerns all the people of the Union, for it is the making ready for the welcome of millions who will some day find homes in California.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 19264) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4250) to further enlarge the powers and authority of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service and to impose further duties thereon.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 18536) providing for the subdivision of lands entered under the reclamation act, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ANKENY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. DUBOIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2188) granting to the city of Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CARTER, Mr. FLINT, and Mr. PATTERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9813) granting a pension to Hariet P. Sanders.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10715) to establish an additional collection district in the State of Texas, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ELKINS, Mr. HOPKINS, and Mr. CLAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6176. An act providing for pay of expenses of district judges.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply rise to ask the parliamentary status. I understand the point of order has been reserved on this section. I insist that the point be made or withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the remark of the gentleman?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], as I understood, reserved the point of order pending the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKINLAY]. Now, I understand the regular order is either the making of the point or order or the withdrawal of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks the gentleman has the right to reserve the point of order pending discussion.

Mr. SHERLEY. The former Chairman ruled just the contrary—the predecessor of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say if anybody demands——

Mr. SHERLEY. I do demand it. I demand the regular order.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can another gentleman, as, for instance, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], make the point of order if he so desires, the point of order having been reserved by another gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has reserved the point of order, as the Chair understands.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. He does that only by unanimous consent. If anyone objects to that and demands that the point of order be made, then the gentleman must either make it or withdraw it, and if the gentleman withdraws it, the gentleman from Kentucky may renew it, if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] insist on his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the alternative now as presented to me is to either withdraw the point of order or make it? Or can not I be recognized to speak to the merits of the proposition as I see fit?

The CHAIRMAN. Not when a decision is demanded.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserved the point of order for the purpose of obtaining some information concerning this paragraph. I suppose that can be done in the regular way, by moving to strike out. So I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, may we know what the point of order is? Some of us were unable to hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is on the paragraph, the Chair will state to the gentleman.

Mr. OLMSTED. What is the point of order?

Mr. KEIFER. There is some confusion as to what this is.

The CHAIRMAN. Lines 19, 20, and 21, page 75. The point of order is on the paragraph. An amendment was offered and the point of order made to the amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. On what ground?

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not here at the time.

Mr. OLMSTED. What we would like to know is, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] will state what this point of order is. We understand from the Chair against what paragraph it is made, but do not know what the point of order is.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It is on page 75, lines 19, 20, and 21.

Mr. OLMSTED. What is the point?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The point is that it is new legislation and not authorized by law. I suppose it is practically covered by the Chair's previous ruling.

Mr. OLMSTED. We do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is quite willing to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts on that proposition, also any other gentleman who desires to argue it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I understand that the topographical survey is authorized only by the same statute which was appealed to to uphold a provision for gauging streams. That is my understanding of the law, namely, that that is the only basis for this topographical survey. And if that is so, of course the ruling of the Chair upon gauging streams would apply also to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. OLMSTED. Very briefly. The survey part, as I understand, the important part against which the point of order was originally made by the gentleman from Indiana, was withdrawn, and the point of order upon which the Chair passed had relation only to gauging streams and determining water supply, for which the Chair ruled there was no authority of law either in the public domain or anywhere else. But this paragraph covers topographical surveying throughout the United States. I think it to be a fact that will not be disputed that this is a Government work in progress. It has been appropriated for year after year, and there are at this moment men at work, actually on the ground, doing tangible, actual work in a dozen different States of the Union. It is clearly as much a Government work as continuing the location of boundary lines or the completion of a list of claims—private claims—against the United States, both of which have been held to be Government works in progress.

The rule of this House requiring previous authority of law as the basis of an appropriation expressly excepts appropriations in continuation of "such public works and objects as are already in progress."

Now, here is an actual, tangible thing. It is a tangible work, and a work in actual progress, making a topographical survey of the United States. There is a map spread out before us that shows the extent to which it has been already accomplished from one coast to the other. Surveying has within the past three years, as the hearings before the committee show, been in progress in forty-five States. It will not be disputed that there are thousands of men at work in the field now on that very work. Therefore I say that this is for the continuation of a Government work in progress, and therefore within the exception to the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to be heard?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not desire to discuss that phase of the point of order covered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I would like to present a suggestion as to whether this topographical work is covered by the original law. The Chair construed the same provision of the act in passing upon the point of order just passed upon. There is nothing in the substantive law creating this Bureau that authorizes a topographical survey. There is in the section phraseology that will permit a geological survey; and I wish to call the Chair's attention to the distinction between a topographical survey and a geological survey. A topographical survey is in no wise incident to a geological survey, but entirely separate and distinct, as is borne out by the testimony of the Chief of the Geological Survey in the hearings before the committee. The work of a topographical survey is entirely apart and distinct from a geological survey and in no wise dependent upon it. As the Chair well knows, and as this committee knows, so far as that is concerned, topographical surveys are surveys of the surface. A geological survey is a survey of the substratum, beneath the surface, and has nothing whatever to do with the topographical survey.

I wish to call the Chair's attention to the limited phraseology in the original act, which says that this officer "shall have direction of the geological survey," not topographical survey, "and the classification of the public lands." The mere fact that he has authority to classify public lands does not give him authority to make a topographical survey, because the classification of the public lands has no relation to a topographical survey. A topographical survey is entirely separate and apart. I read the language that immediately follows:

An examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain.

There is nothing involved in that phraseology, "examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain," that would authorize him to have a survey made of the surface. I contend there is nothing dependent and conditional upon a geological survey that can imply an authority to have a topographical survey made. Therefore, I believe the point of order should be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. KEIFER. I do. If I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin, he concedes that if this is a part of the geological survey, then his point of order is not good. Is that right?

Mr. STAFFORD. The point I make is that in no way is a geological survey connected with a topographical survey.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood you to concede that if it was a part of the geological survey, then your point of order is not good.

Mr. STAFFORD. My whole argument was, and I am very sorry I did not convey it to the distinguished gentleman, that a topographical survey was separate and distinct from a geological survey, and therefore there is no authority to make a topographical survey.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not care to have the gentleman repeat the statement. If a topographical survey is an essential part of the geological survey, as we will soon see, or if it is any part of a geographical survey, then the gentleman's point of order is not well taken.

Now, let us see whether we are in any trouble about that. This is a very important question, and covers other important matters and should be carefully considered. This clause provides for the appropriation of $300,000, to be immediately available, for topographical surveys in various portions of the United States. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see whether a topographical survey is a geographical survey within the meaning of the law. It is, unless the Appropriations Committee, which drew this bill, was entirely mistaken, and unless every other committee and every other Congress making appropriations hitherto of like kind were utterly mistaken. Let us see. I desire the attention of the Chair to this point, for it is the basis of my objection to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is hearing the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. I call attention to page 75 of the bill. In capitals we find the words "For general expenses of the Geological Survey," in line 4; then a colon. Now, I read further:

For the Geological Survey and the classification of the public lands and examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and the products of the national domain—

And so forth. Going down toward the close of that paragraph:

Including telegrams, furniture, stationery, telephones, and all other necessary articles required in the field, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, namely—

That is, the Geological Survey, namely:

For pay of skilled laborers and various temporary employees, $20,000.
For topographical surveys in various portions of the United States, $300,000, to be immediately available.

All these things are connected with the Geological Survey, and are so designated in the bill. The phrase "Geological Survey" is not a mere name which indicates and defines that it is only to be confined to the science purely of geology, but it includes all things that are appropriately placed here under that head. So the topographical survey is put here under the head of the Geological Survey, and so are many other things so indicated in the bill.

Now, if we may appropriate for a Geological Survey, then we may appropriate for this branch of the Geological Survey, as we have been doing hitherto. I do not agree that it is necessary that when we are making an appropriation for the continuance of a survey like this, that it is to be determined by the test as to whether it is a continuation of a public work, or by the test as to whether it must be something tangible or material. It is sufficient if it may be a mere physical survey or a mere scientific investigation, and at all events it comes within the meaning of the language of Rule XXI so often read:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

There has been in progress here for twenty-five years, or a score of years, at least, this work of the Geological Survey, which necessarily includes a topographical survey, and it is so designated and described in the bill and as in former law. It is an object within the meaning of the rules, and it is nothing else, and therefore I insist that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the point of order is not well taken, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [KEIFER], for the reason that a topographic survey is a necessary preliminary to a geological survey under the practice of the Geological Survey of this country, and there can be no such thing as a geological survey, as specifically referred to in lines 22, 23, and 24, unless there shall have been a topographical survey of the territory to be mapped and surveyed geologically. This appropriation might properly read:

For the preliminary surveys as a foundation for geological surveys.

And I call the attention of the House to the map before us, which clearly indicates that these topographical surveys are made as the foundation of geological surveys. The examination of geological structure, examination of the mineral resources and products of the national domain, provided for in the law, and against which no point of order has been made; the preparation of the geological map of the United States herein provided for, none of these things could be completely accomplished without a topographic survey, which this paragraph provides for, which is the foundation and initial work of the geological survey. I am inclined to think, Mr. Chairman, that the same work could be done if this particular provision were not in the bill, that topographic surveys could possibly be carried out under lines 22, 23, and 24 of the bill, because they are the necessary preliminary of the geological survey.

They fix the boundaries of the territory to be surveyed geologically, they run the contour lines indicating elevations, the structure, and character of the country, and with the information that is thus obtained the Department proceeds to the examination and mapping of the geological structure provided for in the law. Without this necessary preliminary work the geological survey, of which it is a part, and a most important part, can not be carried out and completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made to that section of the pending bill included in lines 19, 20, and 21 on page 75, and reads as follows:

For topographical surveys in various portions of the United States, $300,000, to be immediately available.

The Chair thinks it is not subject to a point of order, and will give his reasons very briefly. The Chair desires to distinguish between this item and the one last ruled out by the Chair. In the opinion of the Chair there is no law in existence now authorizing the gauging of streams, nor is there any law in existence now authorizing the topographical survey of any portion of the United States. The Chair desires, however, to say that in the act creating the Geological Survey there is no positive inhibition or prohibition as against the language contemplated in the section now under consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I interrupt the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there anything in the organic act prohibiting the gauging of streams?

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in the organic act which prohibits the gauging of streams, and the Chair is about to distinguish between the two cases. There is nothing in the organic act which prohibits either, and either having once been begun by a provision on an appropriation bill would be a work in progress, provided it came within the meaning of "a public work in progress" as set forth by our rule.

Now, any act or any building or any public work can be begun whether there is authorization in law for it or not, provided no point of order is made on the appropriation. And when once begun it may be a public work in progress and may be continued by subsequent appropriations. For instance, the House can put in an appropriation bill a provision to spend $100,000 to erect a public building without any previous authorization of law, provided no point of order be raised against it; but once having been begun under that act of appropriating, all other appropriations necessary to complete the object would be in order.

Now, the Chair thinks the only difference between this pending proposition and the one last ruled on by the Chair rests in the fact that this is a definite, specific something that can be concluded and completed, while the other was not. The gauging of streams is something that might continue forever; you might gauge the same stream over and over again, and as the water supply decreased or increased the gauging could be carried on. What is meant by topography? The Chair will read:

A detailed description of particular places, especially the art of representing on a map the physical features of any locality.

Now, having once taken the topography of a county or of a State, it remains the same; so that this is a continuing work in progress, in the opinion of the Chair, which distinguishes it clearly from the gauging of streams and the determining of the water supply of the United States, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I now offer again my amendment, which was held not to be in order until the point of order had been determined.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 75, line 20, amend by adding after the word "hundred" the word "fifty."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want the committee to understand what this amendment is and what it means. There has been a great deal said to Members of this House by the scientific gentlemen in the Bureau of the Geological Survey concerning the action of the Committee on Appropriations in respect to all of these appropriations for the Geological Survey. A great deal has been written by scientific gentlemen all over the country, at whose instance I shall endeavor to show, concerning our action in reducing certain appropriations carried for this service. Briefs have been prepared by the men in the Survey and distributed by members to the Members for use in this debate.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that a statement on behalf of the committee should be made, giving the reasons for our action. I therefore ask the attention of the committee while I state our side of the case.

This is something more than a business proposition. It is a question of whether the Geological Survey shall fix the standard of expenditure in its bureau by determining the amount of its appropriations or whether Congress shall perform that function untrammeled by the influence the officers of the Survey can command by reason of the private, State, and municipal interests they serve.

I want to assure every Member of the House that no personal consideration entered into or influenced the action of the committee, either individually or collectively. I say this because Members of the House have said to me that the Director of the Survey said to them that he thought we were influenced by some prejudice against him personally. The committee, in reducing these few appropriations, were actuated by no other motive than that of serving the best interests of the Government. Take, for example, this appropriation of $300,000 for topographical surveys. The Director of the Survey has had no more than that amount appropriated for the service during the past four years except the current year.

Prior to that time, namely, in 1902, they had $250,000; in 1901, $240,000; in 1900, $240,000; in 1899, $180,000, and so on down. The committee, in the last session of the last Congress, reported this identical item at $300,000. But as the result of the influence which the Geological Survey can and does exert through the private interests that are benefited by its work throughout the United States, the same combination was formed here on this floor that now exists, and the House increased the appropriation to $350,000. We reported it at $300,000, because we all know that during the next fiscal year the revenues and the expenses of the Government will run almost equal, with the chances in favor of a deficit. In the desire of the committee to keep down the appropriations as much as possible, and in the hope of preventing a deficit, we felt justified in reporting the appropriations for topographical surveys at $300,000. It has never been more, except for the current year. In doing this we believed the service would not be impaired in the least. It might retard to some extent the making of a few topographical surveys in some of the States, but there would be no harm done and no injury to the public service, and for that reason, Mr. Chairman, we felt this reduction ought to be made in the interests of economy.

The next appropriation complained of is the appropriation for the report on the mineral resources, collecting statistics of the mineral resources of the United States. In the brief which has been prepared by the Geological Survey and presented to certain Members of the House for the purpose of influencing the action of the House in respect to these appropriations it is said that we have cut that appropriation in two; that we have given them $50,000 instead of $100,000, which they say they have this year. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that that is absolutely false, and the man who wrote it knows it is false. We gave them this year just what they had in the past and all they have heretofore asked for for this purpose. They obtained $25,000 from the last Congress for the purpose of investigating black sands, which was a new investigation, and at the beginning of this Congress they came to us and said there was a deficit and that it would require $25,000 more to complete that investigation. They had previously represented that if this work could be done at Portland, Oreg., at the exposition, it could be done very much cheaper, and that they had so many tons of samples to analyze and investigate, and that $25,000 would complete the work. That was entirely outside and independent of the collection of statistics of mineral production heretofore carried on by the Department; and in view of the fact that that work will be completed this summer we reported in favor of an appropriation of $50,000—the same amount they have had the last four years for this service.

Mr. BONYNGE. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, last year was not $75,000 appropriated for the preparation of the mineral resources, and $25,000 in the urgent deficiency bill of this year, making in all $100,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir; $50,000 was appropriated last year for collection of statistics relating to mineral production, and $25,000 was appropriated for the black sand investigation, and at this session of Congress we appropriated $25,000 more to complete the investigation of black sands, so that we have reported in this bill all they have ever had heretofore for this purpose, and there has been no reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to continue my remarks for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I object unless there is some limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana objects. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether it is not a fact that in the appropriation bill of last year there was one item for the preparation of the mineral resources, which included the examination of the black sands—$75,000—and that there was no apportionment of that $75,000 as between the preparation of the mineral resources and the examination of the black sands.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was carried in the same item with a distinct understanding that $25,000 was to be devoted to the investigation of black sands, and that amount was apportioned for that purpose and was exhausted in that investigation, and at the beginning of this Congress we gave them $25,000 additional for the purpose of completing that work, so that in fact they received $50,000 last year for this work. This is the amount they have had for a number of years prior to this year, and they are to have $50,000 during the next fiscal year.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The committee was so kind as to allow me to speak the other day on this measure, and I do not want to speak again, and therefore I simply want to ask the gentleman this question and desire that his time be extended: As he has succeeded in knocking out on a point of order the expense of gauging streams, does the gentleman think it would interfere with his plan of economy as presented in the bill to let us have now this increase for topographical survey?

Mr. TAWNEY. These items should be considered on their merits.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the appropriation for the preparation of this work for a number of years past has been $50,000 a year.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee, I have no doubt, took into consideration the fact that the country is growing, that new mineral fields are being opened all the time, and that a wider range of inquiry is necessary year after year. And taking into consideration that growth and development of the country, does not the gentleman believe that a slightly increased proportion is necessary to take care of the ordinary growth and development of the mineral industries of the country?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the Chairman allow me to suggest, in reply to the question, that the country is not growing any larger than it was and as this work is being done the amount to be surveyed is growing smaller every year instead of larger.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my statement, I think, was not that the country was growing larger, although it has expanded somewhat in the past few years, but the discovery of minerals has vastly expanded. If the gentleman will recall——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. MONDELL. Excuse me.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman evidently does not know the details of this service. If he would study the hearings he would see that this matter was carefully considered by the committee. The committee insisted upon a full, detailed statement as to what was to be done with this $50,000; we find that there are certain gentlemen who are sent out through the country to gather these statistics. This is the first source from which they obtain information regarding mineral statistics. Then they have a system of communication. They have mailing lists or persons to whom they send blanks to fill out, and in this way they collect the information regarding the mineral products of the country. It does not involve the investigation into the mineral resources, it simply involves the collection of information regarding the mineral products for the fiscal year. To a certain extent this work has been duplicated. The Bureau of the Mint, in the Treasury Department, is engaged in doing the same work with respect to precious metals, and we discovered by comparing the statistics furnished by the Mint and the statistics collected by the Geological Survey in respect to the production of gold and silver, that there was a difference of over a million or a million and a half, as I now recall it, in nine States between the statistics furnished by these two bureaus. We also discovered that this work was being duplicated. We got Professor, or Doctor Day, as he is called, and the Director of the Mint together——

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I must decline to yield just now. We got them together. They have agreed on a plan for collecting these statistics that will cost the Government less than has heretofore been expended, so the Geological Survey will, with this appropriation, have even more money to expend this year than it has had during the current year with the same amount.

Mr. Chairman, there is only one other appropriation of any consequence that we reduce, and that is the appropriation for the survey of forest reserves. The reduction is $30,000. That appropriation has also increased very rapidly. This service, Mr. Chairman, it will be conceded is not so very important. Even if this reduction of $30,000 does cause a little delay nobody will suffer in consequence of it. It is a service that will continue for many years, but a service that does not directly affect the people, and if retarded a little will do no harm.

Mr. Chairman, if it were not for the active, energetic work of the Geological Survey in creating sentiment throughout the country in favor of its appropriation, there is hardly a man on the floor of this House who would not accept the recommendations of the committee. This sentiment could not be created but for the manner in which most of these appropriations are distributed.

There is no man employed by the Federal Government who has as many favors to distribute throughout this House as the Director of the Geological Survey. These favors are not given to individual Members, but to their States and their home cities, and therein is the secret of his power. What is he doing with these Federal appropriations? He goes to your State, he goes to my State, and so says: "Unless these appropriations can be increased on the floor of the House or in the Senate of the United States, then we can not do this work for you next year."

This method of lobbying has been carried in this instance to an extent far beyond anything ever before attempted. I want to call attention to it briefly. It shows a system whereby appropriations can be increased that has no equal in our Government. I hold in my hand a letter that I received through the mail, which was written by Mr. Holmes, who is an officer, one of the scientific gentlemen employed by the Geological Survey. It was written in respect to structural material. He sent this letter out—a circular letter, as he stated to the committee—to a large number of engineers throughout the United States. He says:

> I am sending you herewith a copy of his report—
>
> Report of the structural material—
> in response to this resolution, in which he recommends the continuance of these investigations, giving reasons therefor, and asks Congress to make an appropriation of $350,000 for this work during the next fiscal year. The final report on the fuel investigations during 1904 is now ready for distribution (Professional Paper No. 48), and you can obtain free of charge a copy of this report by applying for it at once to some Member of Congress or to the Director of the Geological Survey. If in writing for this report you feel sufficient interest in this work to express an opinion as to its continuance, I am sure that any such expression of opinion on your part will be considered appropriate.

This is only a part of the letter. I will print it in full with my remarks.

When this gentleman was before the committee he was interrogated concerning his right to thus attempt to influence the action of the committee and create a back fire on Congress for the purpose of securing appropriations in the expenditure of which he is directly interested. In one question that I asked him I quoted this language, and said that I would print the letter in connection with his testimony. Subsequently the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], a member of the Committee on Appropriations, asked him a question in which he also quoted that paragraph. On last Sunday I was looking over this testimony to refresh my recollection, and I found this letter as it was printed on page 614 of the hearings. Any gentleman can turn to that page and he will find the letter, but he will not find that paragraph. Knowing that it was there in the original, as shown from my question, I read from page 613:

> You say if in writing for this report you are sufficiently interested in the work to express an opinion as to its continuance, I am sure such an expression on your part will be considered appropriate—

And so forth.

And that also because on the next page, where Mr. Smith asked him the same question, I concluded that some one had tampered with the letter. On the following morning I sent for the original testimony of this gentleman, and found the stenographer sent the letter, with the transcript of that gentleman's testimony, to him personally. When it was sent to him it was not changed in any way. When it came back this paragraph was underscored—that is, the lines I have read were underscored—and on the margin was written, "Leave out these lines" as a direction to the printer. This was done by the man who corrected Mr. Holmes's testimony, and that man was presumably Mr. Holmes, who wrote the letter originally, who was criticised by the committee. He evidently was conscious of having gone a little too far in his attempt to increase the appropriation, and no doubt thought that some criticism might be urged against him on the floor if some Member saw the letter. He therefore deliberately emasculates the letter, which was not his. It was a public document, concerning which he was interrogated, and after that interrogation he deliberately went to work and emasculated the letter by striking out that portion of it which the committee criticised him for writing.

Mr. REEDER. Who wrote the letter?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Holmes.

The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] having expired, by unanimous consent he was granted leave to continue his remarks.

Mr. TAWNEY. The name of the gentleman is J. A. Holmes, and when he was before the committee I handed him the letter and asked him if the signature was his. He said it was; and he also testified, as you will see, that he had sent out a number of them to engineers—to the members of a board of engineers, of which I want to speak later.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? To whom was this letter addressed?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not addressed to anyone. It is a circular letter, and you will find that Mr. Holmes admits it was a circular letter and addressed generally to the engineers.

Mr. DALZELL. Did he not say it was sent out in answer to several hundred letters that he had received from various parts of the country, from engineers and architects, and so on, who were seeking information on this subject and who had addressed him concerning it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; I think he made that statement, and in order to show the insincerity, if not the untruthfulness of that statement, I will read the first paragraph of this letter:

> The United States Senate recently passed a resolution asking the Secretary of the Interior for an expression of opinion concerning the continuance of the investigation of fuels and structural materials by the United States Geological Survey.

He does not say in this letter that it was in answer to an inquiry. That was an afterthought. It was like another letter that I have here.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Just a moment. The day this letter was presented to him he was also confronted with another letter which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] kindly referred to me as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. This letter was written by Mr. Swenson, in Mr. DALZELL'S district, in which Mr. Swenson says:

> Supplementing my letter to you of February 14, 1906, relative to an item of $100,000 in the sundry civil bill for the work of testing structural materials at the laboratory, World's Fair grounds, St. Louis, under the direction of the United States Geological Survey, I am advised this morning by the gentleman in charge of the loboratory as follows:

"I find—

That is, the gentleman in charge of the laboratory, Mr. Holmes, says:

"I find that there is some doubt in the minds of the subcommittee of the sundry civil bill as to whether or not the Government should carry on tests of concrete and reenforced concrete."

He no doubt made that discovery from the questions that were asked him, and immediately he draws on the men with whom he is acquainted, or the engineers throughout the United States, for the purpose of getting their assistance in securing appropriations for the Geological Survey regardless of the judgment of the committee. Then this gentleman goes on and says:

Knowing my impersonal interest in getting at the truth of this important subject, and my desire to see this matter, which is now spreading over the country like wildfire, put on proper scientific basis, he—

The man in charge of the laboratory, Mr. Holmes—

he goes on to ask me to assist in the matter, even to going before the subcommittee and explaining its importance to the country at large. I regret very much that previous important engagements prevent me from lending my assistance by going to Washington in person, and will have to content myself with falling back on our energetic Representative in Congress. Pardon me for again bothering you—

And so forth.

Mr. Chairman, the Geological Survey is the most ambitious branch of the public service we have. The present Director of the Geological Survey had only about $400,000 appropriated for that service when he was appointed Director in 1894. To-day he has over a million. Therefore his appropriations have increased in that time more than 300 per cent. This is the first time in his administration it has ever been proposed to reduce the aggregate of his appropriation. There has been a steady increase. Every reduction now proposed is recommended in the belief that the public interest demanded it, and that there would be no injury or harm in consequence of such reduction.

Mr. Chairman, I spoke a moment ago about the way in which the influence of the Survey has been exerted to increase these appropriations. I have here a telegram which I received from the general solicitor of the Burlington Railway Company. In order to secure the influence of that railway company it was deemed necessary to show that the appropriation for the gauging of streams would in some way affect the Reclamation Service, although in the brief presented to Members of the House by the Geological Survey it is expressly stated that this appropriation does not in any way involve the Reclamation Service. But it was deemed necessary, in order to secure the influence of that great railroad that traverses the reclamation section of our country, to convey the idea to some one that this Reclamation Service was suffering in consequence of this reduction. I have here a telegram from the general solicitor of that road, Mr. Dawes. It is a carbon copy, I suppose, of many received by Members of Congress.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 2, 1906.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I am advised that it is proposed to cut down the appropriation for gauging streams and investigating water supply under the reclamation act from $200,000 to $100,000. Such a reduction would greatly hamper the development of the West in this direction and cut off work where it is proceeding rapidly and advantageously. Hope you will consider it consistent with the public interest to use your influence to see that the appropriation is maintained at $200,000.

CHESTER M. DAWES,
General Solicitor Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway.

To which message I replied as follows:

JUNE 2, 1906.

CHESTER M. DAWES,
General Solicitor C., B. and Q. R. R., Chicago, Ill.:

Wire received. Please advise me in what respect will the development of the West be hampered by the failure to gauge streams in New England, the South, and other States east of the Mississippi River. It is conceded that this work is being done in the interest of prospective investors in water powers. Under what provision of the Constitution can Congress justify the appropriation of public money for the benefit of prospective or actual investors in private enterprise? I sincerely regret I can not consider it consistent with the public interest or with my duty to the people to continue appropriations for gauging of streams in States where the Government does not own a foot of land and where the streams are admitted to be nonnavigable. Reclamation Service is not involved.

JAS. A. TAWNEY.

To which I received the following reply:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 4, 1906.

Hon. J. A. TAWNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I was under misapprehension of the situation when I sent my dispatch to you. I thank you very much for your explanation of the matter.

CHESTER M. DAWES.

Later I received the following letter:

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON AND QUINCY RAILWAY COMPANY,
Chicago, June 8, 1906.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TAWNEY: I am in receipt of yours of 6th instant, explaining the situation with reference to the reduction of the appropriation for gauging streams, etc.

I regret very much to have put you to all this trouble through ignorance of the facts. The matter was brought to me, as I stated, by our traffic people, but who set them onto it I do not know. I naturally took their information as accurate and wired you as I did.

I desire to say that I am in full accord with the position you have assumed in the matter. I do not see what else you could do consistently with your public duty.

I am, with great respect, yours, very truly,

CHESTER A. DAWES, General Solicitor.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not all; knowing that Members were receiving numerous telegrams and letters on the subject of these particular appropriations, I sent to the Secretary of the Interior a dispatch, asking him to send me copies of all letters, telegrams, or other communications sent out by the Geological Survey concerning this appropriation, and I received in reply this letter, which I will not stop to read, with a letter inclosed from the Director of the Geological Survey, both of which I will here insert:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 8, 1906.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Your telegram has been received, requesting to be advised "whether any officers or employees of your Department, particularly of the Geological Survey, have written or sent to any person or persons, outside of Washington, letters, circulars, or otherwise, or telegrams on the subject of appropriations estimated for under the Geological Survey, and if such letters have been sent, please cause copies thereof to be furnished to the committee as soon as practicable."

In response thereto, I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a letter from the Director of the Geological Survey, to whose attention your wishes in the matter were called, submitting a report in the premises, with copies of two letters written by an employee of the Survey in relation to the increasing of certain Survey appropriations.

Due inquiry fails to show that any officers or employees of this Department, outside of the Geological Survey, have sent any person or persons outside of Washington letters, circulars, or otherwise, or telegrams on the subject of appropriations for the work of the Geological Survey.

Very respectfully, E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1906.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am in receipt of a copy of a telegram sent to you on June 5, by the Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, asking that he be advised whether any of the officers or employees of the Department of the Interior, and particularly of the Geological Survey, had written or sent to any person or persons outside of Washington letters, circulars, or otherwise, or telegrams on the subject of the appropriation estimated for under the Geological Survey and asking that if such letters or telegrams have been sent, copies thereof be furnished to the committee as soon as practicable.

I beg to report in this connection that the Director of the Geological Survey has neither written nor sent, nor caused to be written or sent, any such letters, circulars, or telegrams; nor has he been able to learn of any such letters, circulars, or telegrams having been sent by the officers or employees of the Survey, except the two letters copies of which are attached hereto. I may add that a typewritten statement concerning the investigation of fuels and structural materials was sent out on request to the members of the National Advisory Board on Fuels and Structural Materials, about May 20; but it neither contained nor was accompanied by any suggestion of action on their part relative to the appropriation for these subjects.

Yours, truly, CHAS. D. WALCOTT, Director.

JUNE 4, 1906.

Dr. C. W. HALL,
University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of May 28:

We had hoped to be able to continue our topographic surveys in Minnesota this year, but the Committee on Appropriations, of which Mr. TAWNEY, of Minnesota, is chairman, has reported our appropriation bill with great reductions from previous bills. On the item for topography he cut $50,000. The necessary result is that unless this item is restored on the floor of the House or in the Senate we must reduce the amount of work which we are to do, and this will doubtless prevent the extension of work into new areas.

If you are especially interested in this work, I suggest that you immediately bring it to the attention of your Senators.

Very truly, yours,

H. M. WILSON, Geographer.

JUNE 4, 1906.

Hon. JOHN LIND,
Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR SIR: At the request of Hon. LOREN FLETCHER, there is mailed you to-day a preliminary photolithographic copy of Lake Minnetonka map.

We have just received a request from C. W. Hall, of the University of Minnesota, to extend these surveys into the remainder of Hennepin County, and I have advised him that we had hoped to do so, but that the Committee on Appropriations, the chairman of which is from your State, has reported our appropriation bill with a cut of $50,000 in the item for topographic surveying. Necessarily unless this item is restored on the floor when the bill comes up, about the 7th or 8th, or unless it is restored in the Senate we will not be able to extend our topographic work into new areas, and the survey of this region would therefore doubtless have to be deferred until some future date.

Very truly, yours,

H. M. WILSON, Geographer.

Is it not strange, Mr. Chairman, that the only two letters sent out by the Survey concerning these appropriations were sent to Minnesota? This may be a coincidence; if it is, certainly it is a remarkable one. These letters were written to people in my own State, and, the Director says, were the only people addressed on this subject. It may be true, but in view of all the letters and telegrams received by Members it is difficult for anyone to believe it. The first is to Prof. C. W. Hall, of the University of Minnesota—

In reply to yours of the 28th—

Now, I want to say that they started to make a topographical survey of Hennepin County. That is Minneapolis. If any man can tell me or show me wherein we are justified in appropriating public money for the purpose of making a topographical survey for the benefit of street-railway companies and water-power companies, and for the benefit of the municipalities, then I admit that this appropriation ought to be increased twofold, because the Geological Survey could do nothing else but make topographical surveys for the cities of the Union and for the benefit of these private interests during the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to read these two letters.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue his remarks for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Minnesota may continue his remarks for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. This letter I will read first is addressed to Dr. C. W. Hall, of the University of Minnesota, and is in reply to a letter addressed to the Bureau. It is signed by H. M. Wilson, geographer of the Geological Survey:

We had hoped to be able to continue our topographic surveys in Minnesota this year, but the Committee on Appropriations, of which Mr. TAWNEY, of Minnesota, is chairman, has reported our appropriation bill with great reductions from previous bills. On the item for topography he cut $50,000—

Which is the amount the Committee on Appropriations reported to the last Congress, and which his department estimated and had estimated for three years prior—

The necessary result is that unless this item is restored on the floor of the House—or in the Senate, we must reduce the amount of work which we are able to do, and this will doubtless prevent the extension of work into new areas.

How suggestive!

If you are especially interested in this work, I suggest that you immediately bring it to the attention of your Senators.

That letter is signed by Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Was not that letter written in answer to one from Doctor Hall?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; I so stated.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. You omitted the first line.

Mr. TAWNEY (reading):

In reply to yours of May 28—

I stated that it was a reply.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. That line was not read by the gentleman before.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, another letter, which is not "in reply," written to Hon. John Lind, of Minneapolis, who is the man who initiated the movement here in the last Congress to increase this appropriation $50,000:

Hon. JOHN LIND,
Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR SIR: At the request of Hon. Loren Fletcher, there is mailed you to-day a preliminary photolithographic copy of Lake Minnetonka map.

It does not say that Mr. Fletcher requested him to write in regard to his appropriations.

We have just received a request from C. W. Hall, of the University of Minnesota, to extend these surveys into the remainder of Hennepin County, and I have advised him that we had hoped to do so, but that the Committee on Appropriations, the chairman of which is from your State, has reported our appropriation bill with a cut of $50,000 in the item for topographic surveys. Necessarily, unless this item is restored on the floor when the bill comes up, about the 7th or 8th, or unless it is restored in the Senate—

He was very particular to put in the exact date when this bill was to be considered—we will not be able to extend our topographic work into new areas, and the survey of this region would therefore doubtless have to be deferred until some future date.

When I received the letter from Mr. Walcott saying a typewritten statement had been sent out, I sent another telegram to the Secretary of the Interior for a copy of this typewritten statement sent to the board of engineers, and also a request to know who had appointed this board of engineers, by what authority of law they were appointed, and what salary or compensation they were receiving, although the testimony of Mr. Holmes says that they are to receive $5 per day when they actually serve. The Secretary, in answering the communication, sends me another letter from the Director of the Geological Survey, all of which I will not take the time to read:

Replying to the same—

Referring to my telegram—

I beg to report that this board was appointed by the President; and I respectfully suggest that this request for information concerning it should be addressed to the President.

The typewritten statement referred to as having been sent to the members of that board, I am informed, was prepared and sent out to them by the acting secretary of the board. I have neither personal nor official information concerning it, except that when Mr. TAWNEY's previous request was received my general inquiry brought out the fact that such a circular statement had been sent out from the Survey building to the members of this board. And notwithstanding the fact that this action was unofficial, and was explained as having no real or intended relation to the committee's estimate, yet I thought it best to mention it in my former reply to Mr. TAWNEY's inquiry.

I have been unable to secure an exact copy of the statement sent out, but will endeavor to do so and forward it to you later in the day if possible.

Now, I want to call your attention, gentlemen, to this national advisory board of engineers, which has been created as an adjunct to the Geological Survey, to assist in carrying on their scientific investigations respecting tests of building material and fuel or coal tests. This board was appointed without authority of law. They number thirty-nine in all. I have the names of all of them here and the positions they occupy and the States in which they reside. The list is as follows:

From Bureau of Steam Engineering, United States Navy: Rear-Admiral Charles W. Rae, chief, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Chairman, here is a Bureau which has increased its appropriations more than 300 per cent in twelve years, a Bureau that is constantly reaching out for new fields of investigation, a Bureau that is constantly branching out, and has added to it an organization consisting of thirty-nine distinguished and eminent engineers throughout this country, who are to receive a compensation when they are actually engaged in service of $5 a day.

A bureau or board appointed without authority of law.

When are we going to call a halt in the ambition of this Bureau, this man, the Director of the Survey, for whom I entertain the highest respect? The Director of the Geological Survey is unquestionably the ablest man that has occupied the position, one of the best administrative officers in the Government, but when he seeks to use the influence he acquires by virtue of the administration of his department for the purpose of increasing his appropriation I say it is time for this House to call a halt. [Applause.] While he is an eminent scientist, a good administrative officer, these are not his only accomplishments. He is also the smoothest and most scientific and accomplished lobbyist connected with the Government.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota one question. The gentleman is a distinguished Member of this House, has been here a great many years, and I have great respect and regard for him. I want to ask him if all the various researches conducted by the Geological Survey under the leadership of Charles O. Walcott, Director—the gentleman for whom he says he entertains such high regard—I want to ask him if the gauging of streams, the investigation of the mineral resources of the country, and the topographical surveys do not all tend to the development of the United States, do they not all tend to develop the resources of the country?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will answer the gentleman in his own time. What right have we as the representatives of the people to appropriate the people's money for the purpose of developing water powers in the interest of prospective investors? [Applause.] There is no governmental function involved in the doing of that work. The duty of the Government is to govern. It is the duty of the people to develop the country, but not at the expense of the Government. The topographic surveys should be made by the States not by the General Government, and the streams should be gauged by the corporations that desire the water powers at their expense. It is not the business of the Government to gauge them to enable these private corporations to determine whether it will or will not pay to invest their capital in them.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I am not talking about water powers in the interest of investors. I am talking about the development of the resources of the country by the work of the Geological Survey as a whole, which I believe has benefited the whole country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, it has been my fortune to serve on this committee under three different chairmen. Naturally we study our chairman and his methods, and it is no disparagement to either of the other eminent gentlemen who have filled this responsible position since I have been a member of the committee to say that neither one has been more thorough, more nonpartisan, more patriotic in conserving the interests of the Government than the present chairman. [Applause.] Two years ago I served on the subcommittee having the sundry civil bill in charge, and we met precisely the same thing we are meeting to-day. Somebody had been plowing with our heifer. [Laughter.] Somebody had been using influence secretly. We knew it, but could not trace it every time. Somebody was undermining the foundation upon which the committee stood in making this report. Somebody was clandestinely working to undo what the committee had done. The same work has been done now, but it has been traced. It has its headquarters in this city. It is going out to the various parts of the country and coming back here as though the initiative was elsewhere.

I have been on several subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee, and in no other instance, so far as my experience goes, have we run across any bureau chief who seeks as does this one to dominate the committee and therefore dominate the House. Here is a subordinate undertaking to run the committee and through it the Congress. I tell you, gentlemen, when you lose your confidence in the fidelity, the wisdom, and the patriotism of the Appropriations Committee you had better dismiss the committee, and until you do it is not safe to follow the ambitions of a man the appropriations for whose bureau have risen from $400,000 to more than $1,000,000 in a little while, and still he is asking for more. If he can not get in regularly by the front door, then he tries some other way. I appeal to this House to stand by the committee because it is right, and to rebuke this betrayal of trust to gain an end which, however worthy some may think it to be, ought not to be gained by such means as he employs. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to determine the wisdom of increasing an appropriation from $300,000 to $350,000, either upon the excellence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the general fidelity of the committee itself, or the wrongdoing of some employee of the Geological Survey. The question before this committee is whether $300,000 will do the work that ought to be done in making topographic maps for the country. If it is wrong to expend $350,000 in making topographic maps because it helps the street railways, and because it helps some particular individual or set of individuals, it is equally wrong to spend $300,000 for that purpose. If you are going to determine the constitutional validity of your appropriation, determine it not by the size of the appropriation, by the amount of money you spend, but on principle. It does not become right because you spend one sum, and wrong because you spend another sum; neither does it become right because the money is expended in making a topographical map of the country, and become wrong because it is expended in making a topographical map of a city. The people of the cities are as much entitled to have a geographical map made as the people in the country. The act creating this bill provided for a geographical map of the entire country.

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg to differ with the gentleman. The act does not give authority for that at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. The act does provide for the making of a geographical map of the national domain. Now, if the gentleman wants to put all the cities of America out of the national domain, that is his privilege.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is not for a geological survey. I will ask the gentleman this: On what theory does he justify the expenditure of public money for the making of topographical maps of the city of Louisville?

Mr. SHERLEY. On this theory——

Mr. TAWNEY. On the theory that he can get it?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. I do not necessarily justify it that way, for if I did I would have less justification than the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], because I have less ability to get from the Administration things for my district than the gentleman has. I justify it for this reason——

Mr. TAWNEY. In the comparison I think the gentleman from Kentucky would be ahead.

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope so. The gentleman is doing me honor overmuch. When I get to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations I hope to be able to do just as much with my Administration as the gentleman does with his.

Mr. TAWNEY. I hope the gentleman may do more. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, perhaps that is a wish that I can second also. [Renewed laughter.] I certainly do not hope to do less. But that is neither here nor there. I justify these appropriations upon the same ground that I justify the National Government doing many things. The National Government undertakes to do certain things that do not fall within the domain of the States, and whatever may have been said of the original proposition as to whether the National Government had a right to go into internal improvements, a proposition that was fought up and down in the halls of Congress by the ablest men that ever came here, the question has been settled once and for all. We are doing it. The National Government is going into internal improvement, and whatever theory I might have had as an original proposition must fall in face of the actual, concrete facts. The question that confronts the House and the committee is whether you want this work to progress at a certain rate of speed or whether you want it to progress at another rate of speed. The very gentlemen of the committee would not, if they could, prevent the geological work being done or the topographical maps being made. They are simply fighting on the ground of economy. If that be so, if that be the truth, then why not come on this floor and make your fight on that ground?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. And not undertake to divert the thing by making an attack on the head of a Bureau and a Department. It may be that there has been lobbying for this item, but the difference between the lobbying of this Bureau and the lobbying of a great many other bureaus of the Government has been that it has been a lobbying back to the people themselves to get their opinion, whereas most of the lobbying from the bureaus has been for the benefit of individual and special interests for the expenditure of money because it helps some particular industry. Is this House going to determine what it will do simply because somebody has been guilty of wrongdoing? If the President of the United States has done something wrong, contrary to law, as the gentleman says, by making appointments of men to this board of engineers, let the House take such action as it seems proper as against the President of the United States, but do not let us pass upon the validity of an appropriation or its size for any such reason as that. That is neither logical nor is it common sense. What I would like is for some member of the committee to rise and tell us on what theory its reductions have been made of appropriations asked, whether they have simply sliced horizontally without regard to things or whether they have actually looked into it. If they did that, we perhaps might have more opinion of their ability than we have from their own estimates of it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has examined the hearings he will find that our investigation of the appropriation asked for by the Geological Survey takes up almost a third of the entire testimony in that investigation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not speaking of volume so much as I am of quality. Now, let the gentleman tell us why he cuts this appropriation $50,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman has not read it, then I maintain he can not pass judgment as to its quality.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask the gentleman why he has made the reduction of $50,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. I told the gentleman, if he was listening to my statement, the reduction of $50,000 was made because that leaves the amount at $300,000, just the amount they have always had, except this year—not always, for they have only had that amount for the last three years—and we felt that under the testimony, inasmuch as a large amount of this money was to be expended in making topographical surveys of cities for the benefit of street railway companies and water powers and for the benefit of municipalities in determining the grade of streets, that they could get along this next fiscal year with $300,000, especially in view of the fact that the expenses and the revenues of the Government would be very close.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understand the gentleman, his proposition is based on three things—general economy, the fact that the year before the committee recommended $300,000, and the fact that certain moneys are being expended for topographical maps in cities. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows what proportion of the money in regard to topographical surveys was being expended in cities and what proportion outside of cities?

Mr. TAWNEY. When the Director was before the committee he was asked that very question with respect to the distribution of this—he has said he had no intimation that there was going to be any reduction in his appropriation—but he was asked to state how much the amount could be reduced if we eliminated the topographic survey of cities, and he could not give us a definite answer, but gave us in a general way what it would cost to make a topographical map of Boston, what it would cost to make a topographical map of Louisville and several other cities—one they are making now in Cincinnati—but we could get no definite answer from him as to how much of this would be expended for topographical surveys in cities.

Mr. SHERLEY. Where did the gentleman get his definite information to determine how much reduction to make because of topographical maps in the cities?

Mr. TAWNEY. We inferred that if he carried out the plan for topographical survey of cities, it would cost at least $50,000 to do that the next fiscal year, and on that theory we lopped it off.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know it would cost $50,000 to make topographical maps in cities, and is he willing to state to the House as the ground for this reduction the doing of this work in cities?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the chairman will permit me, does the gentleman mean to say if the Director of the Geological Survey was so ignorant of his own office before this committee that he could not state what it would cost to make topographical maps of the cities that his estimates ought absolutely to be taken by Congress, and the committee is in error in not being bound by his judgment?

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not prove anything of the kind, but it at least brings the matter up for this House to consider and not to be told by a member of the committee if we dare to differ with the committee's estimate on an appropriation it is high time to abolish the committee. Now, with all deference—and I have as much respect for the committee as——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky my information is that the Geological Survey does not make topographical maps of cities, but simply adapt to the general work of the Survey maps of the cities made in their——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct that statement, because the Director of the Geological Survey, if the gentleman will read his testimony, gave us a list of cities which they have topographically surveyed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to be absolutely frank in that. There is now being made a topographical map of the city of Louisville. It is being made there, and all the cost resulting from making it vary in the slightest from any other topographical map is being borne by the city of Louisville. And I want to say further that it costs less, foot for foot, square for square, mile for mile, to make a topographical map of a city than it does to make a topographical map of the country; and it is a new creed, a new doctrine, that a man who lives in a city should not have the benefit of Government work, but the man who lives in the country may have it. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan for a question—not all of my time.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman reaches a criticism of the committee just at that particular point. I will say it will lie against every other appropriation recommended by a committee with equal force. You must rely upon the judgment of the committee or your appropriations will increase three and four and maybe five fold. Who is to be the judge with all the information presented?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman's argument is valid, the logic of it is we had better take a bill as reported by the committee and pass it without any discussion at all. The proposition defeats itself. If the committee is infallible, what is the good of wasting the time of Congress in discussing any item in the bill? An amendment may relate to a reduction as well as a raise. The trouble is the gentleman is supersensitive because men happen to differ with the committee's wisdom. Because they want to raise an appropriation is no reflection upon the committee. We accord you proper industry, proper intelligence, but we deny you absolute infinite wisdom. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman this question: You are criticising or endeavoring to ascertain on what basis the committee made this recommendation. I want to say in addition to the reasons I gave a moment ago that the head of the Department, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Director of the Geological Survey, in presenting their estimates for the present fiscal year at the last session of Congress, estimated only $300,000 for this service, but as a result of the Director going over the head of his superior and coming into Congress and making the combination that we have been up against today he was able to secure an increase of $50,000. Now, I want to ask the gentleman this: Do you consider, not having read the hearings at all——

Mr. SHERLEY. I never said that, and I now say to the gentleman that I have read them. I simply said that I was not judging the hearings by their size, as the gentleman was.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that he had not read them.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. TAWNEY. I was going to ask the gentleman on what facts he bases his judgment that $350,000 is the amount that should be appropriated rather than $300,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. I based my opinion on the fact that the man having this work in charge, who needs no better encomium than the one given him by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], said that he needed that much, and it would seriously cripple the progress of that work if it were reduced; that this House last year determined that was a fair amount to give, and I have a little more respect for the House than the gentleman. If I had been a member of the Appropriations Committee and the House had formally taken action as it did last year, I would respect the action of the House and consider its accumulated wisdom at least equal to my own.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man in respect for the industry, ability, intelligence, and courage with which the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations performs the arduous and important duties incident to that position, assisted by the very able Members on either side of this Chamber who compose the balance of that committee. But this is a case in which I find myself compelled to differ with them as to amount to be appropriated. One reason which I have for asking for a larger amount in this appropriation is that for every dollar we appropriate to this service we get $2 worth of work.

Mr. TAWNEY. One moment now. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that this is in violation of the express law?

Mr. OLMSTED. No; I am not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I will cite the law to you, and you will see it.

Mr. OLMSTED. The States appropriate a certain sum of money to help bear the expense of this work, and I am not aware of any law or any constitutional provision which prevents them from so doing any more than there is a provision to keep the State of Pennsylvania from appropriating, as it did in the last session of its legislature, $250,000 to assist the Government in dredging the channel at Philadelphia.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yet, under the policy of State cooperation inaugurated by the Geological Survey, the money which we appropriate for topographical service is available and is expended only in States that will contribute a like amount, thereby giving it to States that would not otherwise get any part of this appropriation and withholding from States a part of the appropriation that they are entitled to and would otherwise receive, but because of their inability to put up the money and cooperate with the Federal Government they can not do it. Now, this money is paid by the States for the benefit of the Federal Government in the making of a topographical survey of the United States, and the statute says:

> Nor shall any Department or any officer of the Government accept voluntary services, or the Government employ personal services in excess of that authorized by law.

There is a clear violation against this cooperative plan of making a geological and a topographical map of the United States. If it is the duty of the Government of the United States to do it, as gentlemen claim, then it is unlawful for the Government of the United States to accept a dollar of this money from any State to aid in making that survey.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended five minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I am not entirely familiar with the statute to which the gentleman refers, and, without reading the whole of it, am unwilling to accept his construction. If it can be so construed as to prohibit State aid, it is certainly not enforced, and it ought to be repealed. If there is no other reason why the Government should not avail itself of what assistance it can get in doing this work and keep this work going on than that it may operate to help some water company or street railroad, that argument does not appeal strongly to me. Why, Mr. Chairman, we appropriate millions for improvement of navigable streams and harbors. The very object of the work done by the Government in that direction is to assist the steamboat companies and steamship companies which operate upon them, the railroads that connect with them, and the commerce of the country generally.

Now, one word as to the work of this Survey in cities. It seems to me that it is hardly understood. I will read from the testimony of Mr. Walcott, the Director, himself.

Mr. TAWNEY. On what page?

Mr. OLMSTED. Page 481. I want to read what the Director of the Geological Survey said in his statement before the committee. I have not spoken to the Director nor had any correspondence with him, nor has any employee of the department asked for my influence or my vote upon this or any other provision. The chairman asked him this question:

> The CHAIRMAN. Do you make topographic maps of the cities?
> Mr. WALCOTT. Only incidentally to the survey of the larger area in the progress of making a general topographic map. In only a few instances we made a special attempt to make a city map very accurate; one was Pittsburg and vicinity, in which the city contributed the additional cost of doing it. Another case was the city of St. Louis, prior to the great exposition there, when it was thought to be desirable to have not only the city, but the surrounding country included in the topographic maps of which St. Louis formed a portion. The city of Louisville recently sent a delegation asking if we would furlough three or four of our men this spring to make a topographic map of the surroundings of Louisville, they to pay all expenses, including their salaries, in order to get a detailed topographic map suitable to base their sewerage system upon. They did not feel that they had the men, or that they could well get the men, that would do that work as well for the city. Of course that is no expense to the Government.
> The CHAIRMAN. Were the men furloughed?
> Mr. WALCOTT. The men were furloughed, and are now doing the work.

Now, I do not concede that there is anything in the statute which the worthy chairman alluded to which would prevent the furloughing of men employed by the Government and allowing them to work a little while for and at the expense of a State or city, and it is the way I understand that State aid is accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLMSTED. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment there is one single item in which the utility of these topographical surveys exceed their entire cost. You never can locate a military camp in the United States without making such a survey, and to have it made specially would cost three times as much as to make it in the way they do now. You can not move an army through the United States or conduct any military operations without such a survey. You can not find the roads or locate the best ground in a State for such purposes. You can not tell where to find the best streams to get an adequate supply of water for the army unless such work as this has been done in advance. The basis of military operations is a survey of this kind, and such surveys can be made much more cheaply in this way, where they get the State to pay half the cost. That is merely one item of the value of these topographical surveys. Their importance in other directions is still greater.

Within the past three years, as I find on page 477 of the hearings, there has been topographical work done in forty-five States of the Union; and so great is the interest of the people in it that the Director says 1,007,280 copies of the atlas sheets have been purchased, and the regular price paid for them has been turned into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I approve this amendment, giving the appropriation for a topographical survey precisely the same amount that the House appropriated for it last year.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the debate upon this amendment, to my mind, tends to show that the Chair was in error in his ruling on the point of order made against this paragraph. The Chair held that the paragraph was in order because it was for the continuance of existing work which would ultimately be completed, and distinguished it from the paragraph for the gauging of streams, because to that there would be no end. The distinction made does not seem to be founded in fact, as the record shows that so far from this work of the topographical survey being completed it requires annually larger and larger appropriations. As the work progresses and large portions of the country are supposed to be thus surveyed, and the amount unsurveyed becomes less and less, one would naturally expect to find the appropriations for this purpose falling off, but quite the contrary is true. They are constantly growing, and the less of the country that remains to be surveyed the larger is the appropriation demanded for the purpose.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. In the last naval appropriation bill we authorized the construction of a battle ship that it is estimated will cost $11,000,000. How much is the entire appropriation, from its inception until now, for the Geological Survey?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not able to state what the entire appropriation has been.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask the gentleman——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Nor do I care to be turned aside into a discussion of the merits of the naval programme.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask the gentleman if——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to decline to yield. I know the gentleman will admit I always yield, but I can not discuss the naval programme.

It has been asserted here this afternoon that the topographical survey is the basis for the geological survey. That, in a measure, is true, and in view of that fact I want to call attention to the map hanging here in front of the House. Those portions colored in pink have been topographically surveyed; those colored purple have been geologically surveyed. Now, if the topographic survey is to be defended as a preliminary to the geological survey, manifestly we have gone so far with the topographic survey that we could wait for years before the geological survey would catch up with the topographic or preliminary work.

I want to call the attention of the House to the distinctions in these topographic surveys. It appears that they have numerous kinds of maps; one, a single sheet covering a square degree, or about 4,000 miles; another size covering about a thousand miles, and another about 250 miles. Now, those that cover the larger area upon the same size paper used for the smaller, manifestly can not go into great detail. They show the result of a cursory reconnoissance. The map covering a smaller area shows more of detail, and so as they reduce the area covered by the map it means more work, more accurate surveys, more accurate records.

If you will examine this map you will find that in the public domain of the United States practically nothing has been done except to make this cursory reconnoissance in certain regions recorded on maps covering 4,000 square miles on a sheet of no value except for the most general purposes. But under this system of contribution, which was instituted by this Geological Survey, without any act of Congress to sustain it, they provide for selling these appropriations to whoever will pay the highest price for them. If a State says, "We will give $50,000," then this Bureau chief, without authority of Congress, diverts the money that would otherwise go to some place else in the United States to that place, in order that he may spend $100,000 in place of the $50,000 given him by Congress. What has been the practical operation of this administration? There is not an acre of Massachusetts, of Rhode Island, or of Connecticut that is not surveyed upon the most detailed scale, the maps covering the smallest territory; the money diverted from the people of the interior, diverted from the lands of the United States, in order that it may be concentrated in those places that will pay the most to get it.

[The time of Mr. SMITH of Iowa having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this paragraph and amendments close in ten minutes, five minutes for the gentleman from Iowa, and five for the gentleman from North Carolina who offered the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] yield to the gentleman from Minnesota to make the motion?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on the pending paragraph be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to amend by making that twenty.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MONDELL, it was rejected.

The motion of Mr. TAWNEY was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas, and then I can yield no further, in view of my limited time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa who directs the bureau or its operatives where to make these surveys?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No one directs them, but the Director, in place of determining where it should go by his unbiased judgment in the interest of the public service, in place of determining whether he will put an equal amount of money in the poorer States not able to contribute as much money as some of the others, diverts the money from the center of the country to New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island until they are complete, and the public domain is unsurveyed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That accounts for the reason that I have been refused the money for certain surveys that I have applied for in geological parts of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is the reason, because these funds have been diverted; and I for one believe that the amount they asked for a year ago for this purpose, in view of the fact that the topographical survey is far ahead of the geological survey, is sufficient until we shall have an opportunity to pass such legislation as will require this Geological Survey to make a fair and equitable distribution of the money appropriated.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have stated I could not yield any further. I simply want to give one illustration of the practical operation of this Survey. I was out at Laurel, Md., last Sunday and I met a gentleman at the hotel there, until recently an agent of the Census Office collecting statistics on manufactures, who asked if the party I was with was a party from the Geological Survey. We told him it was not. He said, "They have been having corps of men out here so frequently that I thought you might be a corps from that body; they have been out here surveying the river and surveying to see what is the best route for a prospective new railroad through the country." That is what the Geological Survey is doing with the topographical map. It is pandering everywhere to local interests to provide means for some local business. It is providing for the measuring of streams to find out what it will pay to give for water power; to find where it is best to build a railroad, so that the company will not have to survey it for itself. It is doing every conceivable kind of work of that character, and the time is coming when some legislation ought to be passed by Congress to distribute this money fairly among all the States. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; I am pretty near through.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Iowa has made a right important statement, and if the Geological Survey has been surveying the routes of railroads, and the gentleman has any evidence of that the House ought to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have given you all the evidence I have, except what is in the hearings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This was a chance remark by an individual you never saw before?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I never met him before.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have you any evidence from any other source of the fact?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have stated all the evidence I have.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If they have been doing that, the country ought to have the evidence, and the House ought to have the evidence.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have stated all the evidence I have.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that if he will examine the hearings he will find that it is conceded by the Director of the Geological Survey that the topographical maps of some of the places heretofore made were made for the purpose of locating and grading street railways.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Topographical maps?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what I understood the gentleman from Iowa to say, that they were making a topographical map.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that has been done, it ought to be corrected right away, and somebody in the dominant party ought to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time I have I shall not refer to the merits of this topographical survey. That has been stated so concisely and admirably by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] and others, that it is unnecessary to do so. But I do wish to refer to one or two inconsistencies which have developed in this debate. The gentleman who made the point of order against this entire paragraph, and who would strike it out, is the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GILLETT, and I would remind the House that he has had his entire State surveyed by the cooperation of the United States Geological Survey. After his State has enjoyed the benefits of this appropriation for this service, he would, it seems, withdraw it from the remainder of the States and Territories of the Union. The chairman of the committee [Mr. TAWNEY] has put the action of the committee on the plea of economy. His entire appropriation for the present year for the Geological Survey is $1,484,000. The report of this committee has cut that down $307,000, or about one-third of the entire appropriation for the current year.

Listen and see in what respect they have cut the current appropriations. They have taken $50,000 from topographical surveys, $30,000 from the survey of forest resources, $25,000 from the report on mineral resources, $100,000 for gauging streams, which I presume will go out upon the ruling of the Chairman, and $102,000 in the investigation of fuel resources; so that it makes a total of $307,000 which the committee has deducted from the appropriations for the current year for the Geological Survey. I take it, then, that it is pertinent to inquire in what respect the committee has followed out its plan of economy, and whether or not it has been consistent. It appears from the report of the committee that the appropriations carried in this bill, not including the amount for the Panama Canal, are $1,728,000, in round numbers, more than in the appropriations for the current year carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. And will the gentleman also state at the same time that we carry seventeen millions in this bill for rivers and harbors authorized by the last river and harbor bill, which is six millions more than was carried in the last bill, and that as a matter of fact the total amount appropriated by this bill is five million less than the current appropriation?

Mr. SMALL. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has had plenty of opportunity to make his speech. I am trying to point out to the House that this plea of economy, which is made by the chairman as a reason for cutting down this amount $50,000, does not apply to all of the items.

The true reason, I think, is stated by the chairman, when he said that $300,000 had been previously appropriated, and that by reason of the fact that $50,000 was given at the last session of Congress he desired it placed back to the old figure of $300,000. Who made the increase? It was the membership of this House. The committee came in with the same recommendation of $300,000, and yet by voluntary action of this House, and by a large majority, that appropriation was increased to $350,000, the same increase which is asked for by this amendment, so that the reason which the chairman gives for his position is not tenable. There was no lobby, as is alleged, which came into the House last time any more than there is at the present time in favor of these appropriations for this Survey. I doubt if a single Member of this House can be found who will say that he has obtained any information from the Director or any of the officers of the Survey, except by his voluntary application, and that in no instance have they attempted by approaching any Member of the House to do any act inconsistent or which could have been constructed as improper lobbying in favor of any of the items of the appropriation for the Geological Survey. So, gentlemen, I have pointed out all that I can in the limited time at my hand. These are some of the inconsistencies that have been urged against this amendment to this appropriation. I hope that the House, in answer to the demand coming not alone from the South, coming not alone from New England, but from the entire country, a demand for this $350,000, will respond and that the amendment will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and debate on the paragraph is exhausted.

Mr. DALZELL. I desire to direct the attention of the committee for a few moments from the outside matters that have been discussed to the real question before the committee.

The pending paragraph reads:

For topographical surveys in various portions of the United States, $300,000, to be immediately available.

Upon a point of order made the Chair has ruled that the proposed appropriation is in order as the continuation of a public work already in progress. An amendment has been offered to increase the amount by $50,000. It is claimed by the officers of the Geological Survey that the efficient continuation of this public work will be hampered unless the amendment shall be adopted.

Hence I want to call attention to the character of the work, to what has been accomplished, and to what remains to be accomplished.

The reason why so many Representatives are especially interested in this item is because it directly affects their respective States.

The topographical survey is a cooperative work carried on jointly by the United States and the several States contributing thereto. As the Director of the Geological Survey said before the committee, "If the Government puts up a dollar, the State meets it." The work in its character, its results, and its prospects can not better be described than in the paper filed by Mr. Walcott with the committee. It is as follows:

The idea of cooperation in public surveys between the Federal and State governments originated in connection with the plan to make a topographic map of Massachusetts. The cooperative survey of Massachusetts was commenced in 1885 and completed in 1888.

At the time of commencing the cooperative survey of Massachusetts the State of New Jersey was engaged in making a topographic map of its area. Attention being attracted to the Federal cooperation with Massachusetts, arrangements were made whereby the Federal survey took up the work and carried it to completion in 1887. Since that time appropriations have been made by a number of States.

The table following shows the States in which cooperative surveys have been completed or are in progress. The scale of all work completed under cooperation, except that in California, is 1:62,500, and the contour interval is from 10 to 20 feet. In California some areas have been surveyed on the scale of 1:125,000 with 100-foot contours, and some special maps have been made on the large scale of 2 inches to the mile, with contour intervals of 5 feet. In the column "Area mapped" only those areas mapped since the inception of cooperation are enumerated:

Cooperative topographic surveys in various States.

METHODS OF COOPERATION.

In the establishment and conduct of cooperative surveys certain methods which have been developed through an experience of eighteen years are followed.

The Director is requested by citizens of a State which may be interested in procuring topographic surveys to inform them as to his ability to accept such offers of cooperation as the State may be prepared to make, it being understood that efforts to secure cooperation must originate with the residents of the State. This Survey furnishes such information concerning the details of previous cooperative arrangements as may be sought, and in other ways assists the State officials and legislators to attain the object desired by them. The State legislature usually enacts legislation providing for a cooperative survey to be conducted under the supervision of a State official or commission, who (1) shall have control of the expenditure of the money appropriated; (2) shall make agreements with the United States Geological Survey as to the methods of conducting the work, and (3) shall recommend the order in point of priority in which various portions of the State shall be surveyed.

It is invariably stipulated that the field operations shall be under the supervision of the Director of the Geological Survey. This Survey furnishes expert assistants, who take charge of the work, and who discuss the results for publication or draft the manuscript maps. All details of the work are performed by them under rules and by methods which experience has shown to be the most economical and judicious, and which tend at all times to maintain a uniformity of treatment for the whole of the United States.

The United States Geological Survey accepts the recommendations of the State officials for the employment of such temporary assistants as may prove qualified for the work, thus insuring the employment of residents of the State so far as practicable. The law usually specifies that a sum equal to that appropriated by the State shall be expended in the same time by the United States Geological Survey.

BENEFITS FROM COOPERATION.

The Federal Survey benefits by the great increase in funds available for the extension of its legitimate operations. This Survey is charged with the duty of making a topographic and geologic map of the entire area of the United States, as well as of studying its water resources and reporting on its other economic products. The expense of this work to the Federal Treasury is reduced by the amount appropriated by the various States for cooperative surveys. To date this amounts to $768,497.

All agreements for cooperation being on the basis of equal expenditure, they necessarily reduce by one-half the cost the Federal Government of conducting its operations. An additional benefit from cooperation is the hastening of the completion of the topographic map, which thus renders it available at an earlier date as a base for the further studies of economic resources, geology, hydrography, and the classification of lands.

From the experience gained certain conditions essential to the success of cooperation have been established. All work which is in part paid for by the Federal Survey and which may be published by it or on its authority must be controlled by the Director. He selects assistants to perform such work, or approves their selection. In its execution the work is subject to the supervision and approval of the appropriate chief of division of the Federal Survey. All agreements for cooperation are drawn in such manner as not to conflict with the organic law of the Survey in regard to collections, furnishing information, or giving expert testimony.

One important point to be considered in all such work is that the general plans and methods of the Federal Survey can not be set aside on account of State cooperation.

At the present time the funds available for cooperation are so limited that its further extension is dependent on increase of appropriations by Congress.

It is against the policy of the Survey to stop work on important areas or subjects in order that cooperation with individual States may be extended. The Director is willing to enter into a cooperative agreement only when the interests of the country as a whole will be benefited.

The appropriations made by the States for cooperative surveys are accepted chiefly for actual field work in which are included the services of temporary employees, who are usually residents of the State, and for the living and traveling expenses of the field force. It may be used in paying office salaries only in so far as it is necessary to equalize the expenses of both parties to the cooperation. Thus the larger part of the amount appropriated by the State is returned to the people thereof.

The appropriation of the Federal Government is devoted chiefly to paying the salaries of the permanent employees, a small portion of it being expended on general administration and a considerable portion on field and office work.

All the assistant surveyors, as levelmen, transitmen, etc., and such helpers as rodmen, teamster, and cook, are employed under regulations of the Department of the Interior, in the locality in which the work is being done and under the terms of a signed application and agreement, which they must file when seeking such employment.

It will be observed from the figures given in this statement of Mr. Walcott that there remain a number of States where the work has not yet been entered upon; and it will further be observed that in none of the States has it been completed. Progress has been made in different degrees in different States. It is apparent, therefore, that this public work in progress demands liberal treatment if its progress is to be continued and any hope of its completion indulged in.

Complaint has been made that the Director of the Survey and his associates have been too active in "lobbying," as it is termed, in the interest of large appropriations, and that they have inspired parties to send letters to their Representatives urging their assistance. At the same time the Director has received merited praise, both for his work and for himself, as a faithful and efficient public officer, in which praise I most cheerfully join. For my part, I rather admire the zeal of a public official who is in love with the work of his department and is desirous of imparting that zeal to others. No part of the appropriation goes into his pocket. His zeal is impersonal and honest, as he believes in the public interest.

Whatever may be the case with others, so far as I am concerned the people of my State needed no inspiration to induce them to address me on the subject, as they had a perfect right to do. In proof of this I desire to submit as part of my remarks the following letters:

Hon. JOHN DALZELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I just learn that the sundry civil bill as reported makes a very serious cut in the amount asked for topographic survey work by the United States Geological Survey. This is a matter that very seriously affects the interests of Pennsylvania.

The appropriation is very largely used for cooperative work with the various States, the amount allotted to Pennsylvania being $20,000, the State appropriating an equal amount. Pennsylvania is not an easy State for topographic mapping, yet the results of the work can not but be pleasing to the people of the State.

The United States Geological Survey has not been able to make a larger allotment to Pennsylvania, as the entire appropriation for topographic work has been but $400,000, and this would not allow of a larger sum to this State even if the legislature would make a larger appropriation for the work on behalf of the State. The proposed reduction of $80,000 means a very serious reduction in the amount of work that can be done in Pennsylvania, for there is some work under way under the direction of the United States Survey that probably can not be cut, so that the cut for work in Pennsylvania will probably be much greater than the 20 per cent cut made in the bill as reported.

Personally, and on behalf of the commission in charge of the topographic work in Pennsylvania, I would esteem it a great favor to have you do all in your power to have the appropriations for the work of the United States Geological Survey restored to amounts asked for the work. The reduction of these amounts means the very serious loss to the efficiency of the work, the breaking up of the organization, which means a direct loss, and a postponement of the completion of the topographic mapping, which is daily becoming more valuable as the work goes on toward completion.

Can not these appropriations for the United States Geological Survey be restored to the amounts asked by the Secretary of the Interior?

Very truly, yours,

RICHARD R. HICE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 4, 1906.

Hon. JOHN DALZELL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DALZELL: I desire to call your attention to the importance of keeping up the appropriation to the United States Geological Survey at least to what it was last year, and increasing the same, if possible. I do not now have either the time or ability to tell you of the immense economic importance to our country of the work of this department along the various lines of topography, geology, hydrography, testing of fuels and building materials, as well as in other lines of scientific investigation; but, as chairman of the Pennsylvania topographic and geologic commission, I beg to say that some years since I had the honor to introduce a bill in our legislature, which afterwards became a law, authorizing our State to cooperate in this work with the United States Geological Survey. At that time I confess that in our State there was little interest in the subject, but as the work has progressed and the people are learning its real economic and scientific values, the demand for it from every section is increasing so rapidly that it is impossible for us with our present appropriation to meet it. Our commission feel assured that the Pennsylvania legislature will increase its appropriation for this work at the coming session, provided the United States Geological Survey will be in position to similarly increase its apportionment to our State. This it can not do if the amount cut out by your Appropriation Committee is not replaced in the bill. The departments of health, forestry, highways, and military of our State are especially interested in the rapid prosecution of this work. So also is every civil engineer, as well as every citizen or corporation who is interested in the development of our great material resources. I know of no direction in which the expenditure of an equal amount of money has been productive of such permanent benefit to our State. At the head of this department are some of the ablest men the country affords. They are devoting their great abilities unselfishly to this work, and should have the hearty financial support of Congress. As to the actual work so far completed in Pennsylvania, not having access to my office I do not have the data at hand, but have asked H. M. Wilson, esq., to hand it to you. I feel that it is exceedingly important at this juncture that you, if possible, give this matter personal attention.

I beg to remain, very respectfully, yours,

G. W. MCNEES,
Chairman Pennsylvania Topographic and Geologic Survey Commission.

SCHOOL OF ENGINEERING,
THE PENNSYLVANIA STATE COLLEGE,
State College, Pa., June 2, 1906.

Hon. JOHN DALZELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: After my conversation with you in Washington on the 28th ultimo I had confirmed what before had been rumored, that the items in the sundry civil bill appropriating $250,000 for the investigation of fuels and $100,000 for testing structural materials were in danger of being eliminated from the bill, or at least greatly reduced. We believe this would be most unfortunate to the people of Pennsylvania.

The work in fuel testing, which has been done under the general direction of the Geological Survey commission, is recognized by all who have given the matter any attention as being excellent; but should no further appropriation be made and the work necessarily stop, the money which has already been expended would be largely wasted. Although some results have been reached, the value of the work up to this time has been mostly in showing what may be accomplished by further investigation.

When it is remembered that the fuel of the United States by the time it is in the fire box costs the nation a billion and a half of dollars annually, an appropriation of $250,000 toward experiments looking to fuel economy is certainly a small item. The investigation carried on by the Government would produce results which would be accepted and could be used by all fuel users. Experiments of this character could be carried on only by large corporations, and if so conducted would, of course, be for their special use and the knowledge would be for them only.

With reference to the item for the investigation of structural materials, the benefits to be derived from the study of these is so great and so far-reaching that it is scarcely necessary to mention them. What is capable of being done in this direction is really not known. The character of structures best adapted to withstand fire or earthquakes is also unknown. The uses to which cement may be profitably put is a comprehensive and unsolved problem. The producers of these materials are not so much interested in the economy of the materials as are the users, and the users consist largely of the people of the United States. It seems, therefore, legitimate that the nation should carry on these investigations.

Knowing your attitude on questions of this kind which are so far-reaching in beneficial results, and the interest you have already shown in this measure, I do not hesitate to write you urging your earnest support in securing the passage of these items.

Yours, respectfully,

LOUIS E. REBER,
Dean School of Engineering.

These letters show the general interest taken in this subject apart from any influences operating from the Department. They are evidence of the real and continued and active interest of those who are familiar with the work of the Survey in the past and are interested in its successful prosecution in the future. I hope that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to call the attention of the House to the fact that no Member from the public-land States has been heard on this proposition. It was originally supposed that this survey was primarily for the benefit of those States. I also rise to ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have asked unanimous consent to address the committee on this subject in view of the fact that during the entire discussion the fact seems to have been lost sight of that originally it was intended and expected that these topographical surveys, which are the foundation for geological surveys, should be made of the public lands and largely in the mineral regions, and I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the map before us indicates that by far the greater portion of these surveys have been made in States that either never had any public lands or where the public lands have long since been disposed of. States that contributed nothing, or long since ceased to contribute, to the Treasury of the United States in the sale of public lands, and that but a small portion of the country west of the one hundredth meridian has been surveyed topographically since the surveys have been executed on the present scale. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has stated that it costs no more to topographically survey the city of Louisville than a like area out in the country, where the transit men can see for great distances, where from an elevation distances can be triangulated for miles, where mapping is much more simple, and where the surveys made, as in the case of the old Powell surveys in Utah and elsewhere, were on contour intervals of 50 feet, while the contour intervals in the city of Louisville, I assume, are a foot or two.

Mr. SHERLEY. And the additional cost is paid by the city of Louisville.

Mr. MONDELL. And I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that, in my opinion, that is one of the evils which has grown up under this survey, a survey wisely inaugurated, a survey which, in the main, has been economically carried on, a survey which has been of great value, and I do not claim that these surveys should not be made in the city of Louisville, that they should not be made in the city of Boston. I do wish, however, to emphasize the fact that while we have for years heard discussions of this and similar items as though they were for the especial benefit of the West, and for the development of the western region, the mountain region, the public lands, as a matter of fact, the eastern and southern brethren have managed to secure the lion's share. By far the greatest proportion of the expenditure has been made in States that needed it the least, because they were the best able to make their own surveys, as evidenced by the fact that they have been able to contribute a portion of the cost of the work. I believe in these surveys. I do not complain because of their being executed in all portions of the country, but I do believe that the amount which the committee has reported is quite sufficient to carry on the work in all parts and portions of the country with reasonable speed, and I do trust that in future the West, which was originally expected to be the main beneficiary of this class of work, will at least get a fair proportion of the expenditure. In that region are the public lands which need developing; there are the public mineral lands which should be geologically surveyed and reported upon. I make no complaint in regard to my own State. I think we have been reasonably well treated, but I do think the public domain, as a whole, has not had as large a share in this work as it should. I hope the work will go steadily on, not by fits and starts, but continuously, and I think it is most likely to do so if we do not further increase the appropriation at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 101, noes 54.

Mr. TAWNEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chair appointed Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. SMALL as tellers.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 55.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the preparation of the report of the mineral resources of the United States, which report shall hereafter be published in one octavo volume and as a distinct publication, the number of copies, printing of separate chapters, and mode of distribution of which shall be the same as of the annual report, $50,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the lectures on economy to which the House has been treated this afternoon. I sympathize with all real economy, and I am under the impression that genuine economy demands that we liberally support the Geological Survey. This is one department of the Government which aids in the production of wealth, while others that gentlemen do not hesitate to support with lavish appropriations are mere consumers. If we were to spend fewer millions on an excessive naval development, which the country does not need, we would have more to spend in promoting industrial growth, which we do need.

I shall address myself to that item in the bill which has to do with a continuance of the fuel-testing plant at St. Louis. I have been more or less familiar with the work of the plant since it was inaugurated, and I believe that the economies in the consumption of coal which they have suggested is worth much more to the country than the total cost of the Geological Survey since it was established.

SOME FACTS IN REGARD TO THE HISTORY OF COAL PRODUCTION IN THE UNITED STATES TO THE CLOSE OF 1905, AND SOME ESTIMATES AS TO THE FUTURE.

It has been estimated by one of the geologists of the Geological Survey that the total original amount of coal contained in the various beds of the United States was 2,200,000,000,000 tons of 2,000 pounds, which is equivalent to about 422 cubic miles of coal. If spread over the entire coal area of the country it would make a bed averaging 6½ feet thick. I have been informed by a member of the Geological Survey that the history of coal mining in the United States shows that during the last half century the entire production of coal has been practically doubled every ten years, and at my request the following table, compiled from official sources, has been prepared. It bears out the previous statement given me. This shows also that up to the close of 1905 the total production in the United States amounted to, say, 5,980,000,000 tons. This does not include any of the coal left in the mines to support the roof or otherwise necessarily wasted. The fact is, the amount wasted is equal to about one-third of the total amount under our present conditions of mining. This production, by decennial periods, is as follows:

Coal production, by decennial periods, to the close of 1905.

	Short tons.
Total production to close of 1865	335, 865, 947
Production for decade 1866–1875	419, 425, 104
Total production to close of 1875	755, 291, 051
Production for decade 1876–1885	847, 760, 319
Total production to close of 1885	1, 603, 051, 370
Production for decade 1886–1895	1, 556, 098, 641
Total production to close of 1895	3, 159, 150, 011
Production for decade 1896–1905	2, 820, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1905	5, 979, 150, 011

From the foregoing statement I have had prepared an estimate which shows how this production of coal would continue if the proportionate rate of increase were kept up. It will be observed that there is a decreasing ratio in the decennial increase. In the following statement this ratio has been maintained, so that while, as in the preceding statement, it has been shown that the production for the decade 1876–1885 was something more than the total production to the close of 1875, the production estimated for the final ten-year period in the following table is about 55 per cent of the total production to the beginning of that decade. This statement also shows that if this rate of increase continues the entire supply will be practically exhausted in one hundred and ten years, not including the wasted production heretofore mentioned:

Estimated production by decennial periods for the future.

	Short tons.
Total production to close of 1905	5, 980, 000, 000
Production for decade 1906–1915 (90 per cent)	5, 380, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1915	11, 360, 000, 000
Production for decade 1916–1925 (85 per cent)	9, 640, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1925	21, 000, 000, 000
Production for decade 1926–1935 (81 per cent)	17, 000, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1935	38, 000, 000, 000
Production for decade 1936–1945 (77 per cent)	28, 700, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1945	66, 700, 000, 000
Production for decade 1946–1955 (73 per cent)	48, 700, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1955	115, 400, 000, 000
Production for decade 1956–1965 (70 per cent)	80, 000, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1965	196, 200, 000, 000
Production for decade 1966–1975 (67 per cent)	131, 500, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1975	327, 700, 000, 000
Production for decade 1976–1985 (64 per cent)	209, 700, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1985	537, 400, 000, 000
Production for decade 1986–1995 (61 per cent)	327, 800, 000, 000
Total production to close of 1995	855, 200, 000, 000
Production for decade 1996–2005 (58 per cent)	496, 200, 000, 000
Total production to close of 2005	1, 351, 400, 000, 000
Production for decade 2006–2015	743, 300, 000, 000
Total production to close of 2015	2, 094, 700, 000, 000

It is, of course, not to be supposed that even this decreasing ratio of increase will be maintained. I have quoted the above figures simply to show the possibilities, not probabilities. In fact, the member of the Survey to whom I am indebted for an estimate of the quantity of coal originally contained within the coal fields of the United States, states that the production may continue to increase to a maximum of about 150,000,000,000 tons per decade (an average of 15,000,000,000 tons annually), and then gradually decrease for possibly another hundred years. Both estimates, however, are startling in the extreme, particularly when it is realized that at the rate of production in 1904 (350,000,000 tons) the coal supply would last for about 5,000 years. If, on the other hand, the present ratio of increase in consumption is continued the supply will be exhausted in one hundred and ten years.

All this suggests the extreme importace of the fuel tests which for two years we have been making at St. Louis. We must find an economic way of using the fuel supply, or some day, sooner or later, we will be face to face with exhaustion of a commodity which, whatever the future may have in store for us, is now essential to the comfort and happiness of the human race.

The fuel tests conducted by scientific experts offer the only ray of hope in the way of an increased supply.

The best efficiency now obtained in the ordinary railway locomotive practice represents only about 5 per cent of the energy stored in coal. That is to say, we have to burn 20 tons of coal in our locomotives to get the power which Providence put into 1 ton.

In the stationary boiler practice we get better results, for we have managed to make available for economic purposes about 20 per cent of the energy of the coal—that is to say, in stationary boilers we only have to use 5 tons of coal to get the energy that is in one.

It has been stated by some of our best engineering authorities that only one-seventh of 1 per cent of the energy of coal is now made useful in our incandescent electric lighting.

Of course these estimates of the total supply of coal in the country may be inaccurate. Other fields of coal, the existence of which is not now suspected, may be found in the future. Those we know of may not be as extensive as we think. But whatever the amount is we can not increase it except by finding more economical methods of consumption.

It is plain that if we could learn how to use all the energy of coal in locomotives we would, so far as that particular industry is concerned, multiply the coal supply of the country by twenty, and so on in the proper ratio with other industries. The fuel testing done at St. Louis is intended to do just exactly that thing. To an important degree it has already been successful. Take what has been accomplished in the way of an improved method of using lignite, or brown coal, for instance. It has shown to the mechanical and industrial world that a class of fuel which has heretofore been held in contempt is of vast importance. The State of Texas, except in the one article—fuel—received the favor of the Lord in a prodigal way. We have no really high-grade coal, such as is found in Pennsylvania and West Virgina, for instance. But we do have a great area of lignite deposits, and enough value has been added to these deposits by the fuel testers at St. Louis to justify every dollar of expense for the maintenance of the Geological Survey since its establishment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the preparation of the report of the mineral resources of the United States, which report shall hereafter be published in one octavo volume and as a distinct publication, the number of copies, printing of separate chapters, and mode of distribution of which shall be the same as of the annual report, $50,000.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 76, line 12, strike out the word "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" so that it will read "seventy-five thousand dollars."

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, in the appropriation bill of last year there was appropriated for this purpose, covered by this item, the sum of $75,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, now right there I want to state that that is not a statement of fact.

Mr. BONYNGE. I submit, Mr. Chairman, it is a statement of fact; and the gentleman, answering a question I propounded to him a short time ago, himself said that it was a fact that $75,000 was appropriated for this purpose, which included, as I was about to say, an investigation of the black sands, which is included in this item, although it is not specifically mentioned.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not included, and it was included and appropriated for to the extent of $25,000 this present year.

Mr. BONYNGE. The item for the preparation of the report on mineral resources, including the investigation of black sands, in the appropriation bill of last year was $75,000. Later this year, in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, it was necessary for the Appropriations Committee to appropriate another $25,000 in order to make up the deficiency.

In the hearing before the Appropriations Committee at this session relation to this item, at pages 498–499 of the hearing, the Director of the Geological Survey gave a memorandum as to the cost of preparing the report on mineral resources, and by that memorandum it was shown that the expenses for preparing this document would be in the aggregate $73,200. He gives the items on page 499. On page 505 of the hearing this year before the Appropriations Committee it was also shown that the expense of preparing this document for 1905 aggregated $74,504.75.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for more than five years past, as I recall, the sum of $50,000 has been annually appropriated for this purpose. During that time, Mr. Chairman, the aggregate of our mineral wealth has increased nearly double what it was when $50,000 was first appropriated for this purpose. It has increased from one billion dollars to nearly one billion and three-quarters, and with that growth in the aggregate of the mineral wealth of the United States the cost of preparing the pamphlet has necessarily increased, and the additional amount of $25,000 asked for is a paltry sum in comparison with the increased amount contributed by the mineral industry to the wealth of the nation. The evidence before the committee, on the statement of the Director of the Geological Survey, shows that these statistics can not now be gathered together and this work done for less than $73,000, and that it has cost in the past more than $50,000.

So I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in asking for this increase we are simply asking for an amount which the testimony before the committee developed was necessary to be appropriated in order that this document might be prepared. It is one of great value. We are appropriating large amounts of money for the development of the agricultural resources of the country and for gathering together information relative to the development of our agricultural resources, publishing farmers' bulletins, and other documents of great value to the farmer. No one finds fault with the appropriations made for those purposes. It is also important that the statistics relative to the development of the mineral wealth of the country should be collected and published for the information of the people.

This is a document of very great value to those interested in the mining industry of this country, and we are merely asking for a paltry increase of $25,000, in order that this work may be properly carried on. I hope that the committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct a statement which the gentleman made in closing, that this involved an increase of only $25,000. Such is not the fact. There was $50,000 appropriated for the report on mineral resources for the fiscal year 1905. When preparing this appropriation for the fiscal year 1906 it was represented that at the Oregon Exposition they could conduct this inquiry into the location of black sands, and investigate their value, with the machinery that would be loaned to them by exhibitors at that exposition.

These facts prompted the committee to recommend an appropriation of $25,000, which amount was included in the appropriation for report on mineral resources. Now, they came to us at the beginning of this session and said that that $25,000 was appropriated for that specific purpose, in connection with the $50,000 appropriated for the Report on Mineral Resources, and that the work could not be completed with that appropriation, that to complete it would require $25,000 more. We gave them $25,000 more, and that $50,000 for the investigation of black sands the Geological Survey now proposes to attach here as a permanent appropriation. For what? Nothing that relates to the development of mineral resources. The development of mineral resources is not involved in this appropriation. It means merely the collection of statistics with reference to the mineral products of the various mines throughout the United States. Why is it so valuable? Who wants this information? Why, Mr. Chairman, this information is collected by the agencies——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman if he has any idea of the great number of tons of paper that are printed on this subject that are never opened or looked at at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know, but I presume that the Committee on Printing could give the gentleman some information on that subject. Or if any Member of this House would go to the folding room, I presume he would find hundreds and hundreds of books entitled "Mineral Resources" lying there undistributed, containing information as to the products of the mines of the country. This appropriation is to pay for collecting information concerning production. In addition to it there is an appropriation of some $68,000 for printing the report after the statistics are collected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Minnesota will allow me, my district may be different from others, but I want to say that I always have requests for all the reports on the mineral resources of the United States that I get.

Mr. TAWNEY. I haven't any doubt but that they are of great value to the colleges and institutions of learning and to those especially interested in the growth and development of the mineral resources of the country, but what I want to make clear to the House is the fact that this appropriation does not relate in any way to the development of the mineral resources of the country. This appropriation is for the purpose of collecting statistics. An appropriation of $50,000 is all that they have ever had for that purpose, and that is what the Committee on Appropriations has recommended.

The appropriation has been $50,000 since 1900. Prior to that time it was $30,000, $20,000, $18,000, and $10,000. In 1891 it was only $10,000. Since that time this Bureau, under these ambitious gentlemen of the Geological Survey, has taken in a number of other scientific gentlemen engaged in this work, and if there is any additional amount needed it is because of their employment. We are giving them as much as they have ever had for this purpose. Now, the $50,000 which they had in addition to this during the present fiscal year is the $50,000 appropriated for the investigation of black sand, which was a new subject, and when we appropriated the last $25,000 we provided that the $25,000 appropriated should complete this investigation. There is absolutely no necessity for this increase of $50,000, which is double the amount that has heretofore been appropriated for this service.

Mr. BONYNGE. The gentleman does not mean that we are asking to double the appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do say that you are proposing to double it.

Mr. BONYNGE. No; we are only adding $25,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman a question along the line of my interrogatory some time ago—whether or not the committee went thoroughly into the details in regard to the expenditure under this head, and are satisfied that the sum provided is sufficient to meet the increased and growing demands of the country?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that the committee did go into the matter very thoroughly, so thoroughly that we had a conference with the Director of the Mint and Doctor Day, who has this particular branch of the service of the Geological Survey under his charge.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a very important report, but I do not think we ought to appropriate more than is necessary.

Mr. TAWNEY. You are appropriating as much when you give them $50,000 as they have ever had for collecting the statistics in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I wish to correct the statement made by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee as to the investigation of black sand. I have the report of the last investigation, and it is "An investigation of the properties of black sand: A combination of other methods of treatment; to which is appended a list of the localities where they occur and the proper methods of treatment of each separate section of black sand."

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. The gentleman refused to yield to me, and now I will refuse to yield to him. I am entitled to five minutes and I insist on the full use of my time. To stop the appropriation for the Mineral Resources means the loss of much time and the sacrifice of samples awaiting the tests which have been hauled by the railroads free of charge from various points in the far West.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the report provided for by this appropriation is an exceedingly important one. The gentleman suggests that it has no relation to the development of the mineral resources of the country.

Mr. TAWNEY. I say it is not the basis of the mineral development.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman says it is not the basis of the mineral development, and I admit that. This report does, however, aid, in my opinion, to a considerable extent in developing the mineral resources of the country. The publication of this report of the mineral products of the various States and Territories, of the localities in which minerals are found, the extent of the deposits, and other detailed information given in the report is of great value, and does aid, in my opinion, very considerably in the development of the mineral resources of the country. I understand that the gentlemen of the Geological Survey, in the hearings before the committee, insisted that their detailed statement of the estimated expenditure for the preparation of this work stated the very least sum with which the work could be properly prepared under the conditions now existing, and that was, I am told, a trifle less than $75,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. That detailed expenditure included the black-sand investigation at Portland.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman from Wyoming will allow me, the gentleman says that included the black-sand investigation. I want to say from my somewhat inadequate knowledge, that one of the most important things the Government is doing is the black-sand investigation.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true; that work is important, and no doubt this report will contain information on the investigation of the black sands that has been made, and in my opinion, taking into consideration the growth of the mineral products of the country, the discovery of new minerals, the opening of new mineral regions and of many new producing mines in widely scattered areas, this appropriation must necessarily increase gradually.

The fact that there has been no increase in the appropriation for five or six years is the best argument for the increase at this time, in view of the very great increase in the mineral production of the country in the last few years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BONYNGE) there were—ayes 29, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of necessary books for the library, including directories and professional and scientific periodicals needed for statistical purposes, $2,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the sundry civil bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

KINGS MOUNTAIN BATTLE GROUND.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 17983) providing for the erection of a monument on Kings Mountain battle ground commemorative of the great victory gained there during the war of the American Revolution on October 7, 1780, by the American forces, with a Senate amendment thereto.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

CLINTON COUNTY, IOWA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18330) transferring the county of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, from the northern judicial district of Iowa to the southern judicial district of Iowa, with a Senate amendment thereto.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS BY UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has requests from a number of Members about matters that ordinarily are passed by unanimous consent—bridge bills. Is it the sense of the House that they be disposed of now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it is now 25 minutes after 5 o'clock, and we met this morning at 11. I think that after 5 o'clock is a very bad time for the House to consider matters of unanimous consent. Paradoxical as it may seem, the Speaker, I think, will agree with me that it is easier to pass a bill by unanimous consent than it is by vote of the House, and unanimous consents ought not to come after 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a moment, Mr. Speaker. I have no objection to its being done, with the understanding that the gentleman from Minnesota will attempt to rise by 5 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi knows very well that in the handling of a bill like the sundry civil bill one can not always fix definitely the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was for that reason that I put it that he would try to rise.

Mr. TAWNEY. I shall try.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course if the gentleman tries hard enough he can do it. I understand now this evening that we were in the midst of a little debate on a question, and it was very difficult for the gentleman to cut it short, but I hope that the spirit of that idea will be carried out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that there are many conference reports, as the Chair is informed, ready for action. Of course it is only a friendly understanding. The Chair does not understand that there is a hard-and-fast agreement that the House will adjourn at 5 o'clock.

Mr. OLMSTED. Only that the committee will rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that in spirit the gentleman will rise by 5 o'clock. After that, matters will come up before the House in the regular way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota, and it is so ordered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. AIKEN to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of John F. Lathem (H. R. 8475, Fifty-ninth Congress), no adverse report having been made thereon.

LIGHT-HOUSE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 19432) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Light-House Establishment, together with a statement of the conferees for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed under the rule.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 14, 1906.

Rev. CHARLES CUTHBERT HALL, D. D., of the city of New York, offered the following prayer:

Let the people praise Thee, O God; let all the people praise Thee.

Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, and even our own God, shall bless us.

God shall bless us; and all the ends of the earth shall fear Him.

Let us pray.

O God of nations, who setteth up one and putteth down another, most heartily we thank Thee for Thy good providence toward us and our fathers. We bless Thee for the foundation of this Republic on principles of truth and humanity. We call to remembrance the illustrious founders of our constitutional liberty and all others who by life or death have served and suffered for the welfare of the State.

Inasmuch as on this day, by common consent, the flag of the United States is honored and exalted among the people, we beseech Thee to protect and sanctify that flag forever by the sure defenses of righteousness. Give unto us and to our children the spirit of reverence and obedience. Let integrity and uprightness preserve us. Cleanse the nation from whatsoever defileth or maketh ashamed. Ennoble all citizens with the purpose of goodness, to the end that throughout all the world the flag of the United States may be a symbol of honor, of brotherhood, of peace.

We pray for the President and Vice-President, for all counselors, legislators, judges, ambassadors, and ministers of state, for the Army and Navy. Especially we pray for the Senate this day assembled, that it may be true in purpose, wise in counsel, resolute in action, deserving and receiving the gratitude of the people and the continual favor of God.

This we ask in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

SENATOR FROM KANSAS.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I present the credentials of Hon. Alfred Washburn Benson, of Kansas, appointed by the governor of that State to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator Burton. I ask that the credentials may be read, and that the oath of office may be administered to my colleague.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the credentials presented by the Senator from Kansas.

The Secretary read the credentials, as follows:

Hon. CHARLES WARREN FAIRBANKS,
Vice-President of the United States and Ex-Officio President of the Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

Know ye that I, E. W. Hoch, governor of the State of Kansas, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, patriotism, and abilities of Alfred Washburn Benson, on behalf and in the name of the State, do hereby appoint and commission him a Senator in the Congress of the United States, from the State of Kansas, to fill vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. Joseph R. Burton until the next meeting of the legislature of this State, and until a successor has been elected and qualified, and empower him to discharge the duties of said office according to law.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State.

Done at Topeka, Kans., this 11th day of June, A. D. 1906.

[SEAL.] E. W. HOCH, Governor.

By the governor:

J. R. BURROW,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, it will be observed that the certificate is not in proper form. I call attention to the fact that by it the governor appoints not only to the vacancy until the next meeting of the legislature, but until the legislature shall elect. Under that certificate, if valid, and the legislature should fail to elect, Mr. Benson might hold for life. But the certificate nevertheless, I think, is sufficient, as that portion of it which assumes to supply the vacancy "until the legislature shall elect" can be regarded as surplusage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be filed. The Senator appointed will present himself at the desk and take the oath prescribed by law.

Mr. Benson was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. LONG, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

FINDINGS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of James M. Price, sole heir and legatee of Thomas J. Price, deceased, v. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. ALLEE presented the credentials of Henry A. Du Pont, chosen by the legislature of the State of Delaware a Senator from that State for the unexpired term ending March 3, 1911; which were read and ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

FIRE DEPARTMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SCOTT. I report back from the Committee on the District of Columbia without amendment the bill (H. R. 4464) to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to make one statement in regard to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. It is a very important bill, and there ought be some scrutiny in these last days of important bills. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will state for the benefit of the body, so that we may know something about the bill, what features in it are new, what is the need of it, and what changes are made in salaries, so that when the Senate passes it we may not be absolutely "like dumb, driven cattle," knowing nothing whatever of what was before the body. I ask the Senator to tell us.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask the Secretary if he has not with the bill the report of the committee adopting the House report? It will give the Senator the information, I think.

I wish to say to the Senator that this bill was very carefully prepared by Congressman CAMPBELL, of the District Committee of the House. As the Senator no doubt noticed from the reading, it is to take effect the 1st of July, and while there is possibly one amendment which should have gone into the bill, covering the case of the trial of firemen for misconduct, the District Committee thought it best not to endanger the passage of the bill by amending it, for fear that if sent back in an amended form it might not become a law.

If the Senator will listen to the reading of the report, I am sure he will have no objection to the bill. It will explain fully the nature of the bill.

Mr. HALE. What is the main necessity for the bill? The Senator can tell us that.

Mr. SCOTT. The main feature of the bill, I will say to the Senator from Maine, is an increase in the salary of the fire department on the same ratio that the increase was made in the salary of the police department. It increases the salary of the men in the department.

Mr. HALE. To what extent?

Mr. SCOTT. Forty-eight hundred dollars will go to the higher officers. The balance of the increase goes to the men. The total amount that the bill will carry will be about $83,000.

Mr. HALE. Eighty-three thousand dollars annually?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the firemen having fair and generous pay, but I do not think any bill to increase salaries ought to go through without the Senate knowing the extent. Does the Senator know what percentage of increase the firemen will have under the bill?

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the Senator from Maine that I was compelled this morning to attend a meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs. I have sent now to the room of the Committee on the District of Columbia for the memorandum concerning this bill. I will ask that the matter go over, and I will call it up a little later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the Calendar.

FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6395) for the exchange of certain lands situated in the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, and other considerations, for lands adjacent thereto, between Le Grand Young and the Government of the United States, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs were, in section 1, page 2, line 20, after the word "Utah," to insert "and to Salt Lake City, a municipality organized and existing under the laws of the State of Utah, in the State of Utah;" in line 21, after the word "line," to insert "or lines;" on page 3, line 7, after the words "repair of," to strike out "a pipe line over the following-described portion of said lands: Commencing at the northwest corner of the University of Utah campus, running thence north along the west boundary of the Fort Douglas United States Military Reservation 200 feet; thence east 1,164.83 feet; thence south 200 feet; thence west 1,164.83 feet to the place of beginning;" and insert "the tank house belonging to the said Salt Lake City, as at present situated on the foregoing-described land;" in line 22, after the words "six hundred," to insert "and forty;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of War, for and on behalf of the United States, is hereby authorized to grant and convey by deed to Le Grand Young, his heirs and assigns forever, that portion of the lands comprised within the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, adjoining Salt Lake City, Utah, described as follows, to wit: Commencing at the west boundary line of the Fort Douglas Military Reservation at a point where it is intersected by the south line of First South street, in Salt Lake City, Salt Lake County, State of Utah, and running thence north on said west boundary line of said military reservation a distance of 1,590 feet, more or less, to the southwest corner of what is known as "Popperton place," in Salt Lake City; thence east on a line between the said military reservation and the said Popperton place, a distance of 1,159 feet; thence south on a line running parallel to the said west boundary line of the military reservation a distance of 1,590 feet, more or less, to the northeast corner of the land granted to the University of Utah by act of Congress approved July 23, 1894; thence west along the north line of said university lands a distance of 1,159 feet, to the place of beginning, containing 42.3 acres of land, reserving, however, for the use of the military and the public a right of way in and over the present macadamized road leading from the post of Fort Douglas through said premises to Salt Lake City: Provided, That there is hereby granted and reserved to the University of Utah and to Salt Lake City, a municipality organized and existing under the laws of the State of Utah, in the State of Utah, a perpetual easement for the construction, maintenance, and repair of a pipe line or lines over the following-described portion of said lands: Beginning at the intersection of the north line of First South street with the west line of the said military reservation, and running thence north along the west line of the said reservation 50 feet; thence east 1,159 feet; thence south 50 feet; thence west 1,159 feet, to the place of beginning: And provided further, That there is hereby granted and reserved to Salt Lake City, a municipality organized and existing under the laws of the State of Utah, in the State of Utah, a perpetual easement for the construction, maintenance, and repair of the tank house belonging to the said Salt Lake City, as at present situated on the foregoing described land. The Secretary of War is further authorized to convey to the said Le Grand Young, his heirs and assigns, a right of way 100 feet wide, for a railroad and wagon road, along the south side of the said military reservation, within metes and bounds as follows: Commencing at the southeast corner of the said military reservation, and running thence west 640 rods to the southwest corner; thence north 100 feet; thence east 640 rods; thence south 100 feet to the place of beginning: Provided, That said roadway shall be subject to use by the public for highway purposes.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATERS OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT ST. PAUL, MINN.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on Commerce I report back without amendment the bill (S. 6451) to provide for a commission to examine and report concerning the use by the United States of the waters of the Mississippi River flowing over the dams between St. Paul and Minneapolis, Minn., and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator certain that what is embraced in the bill is not covered in the work of the waterways commission?

Mr. NELSON. I will explain to the Senator the object of the bill. If the bill could be read the Senator would see the object of it. The bill has not been read. Will the Senator allow the bill to be read?

Mr. HALE. Certainly. My only point is whether it is embraced in the great waterways commission which is now at work.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created to examine and report to the Secretary of War, for transmission to Congress, concerning the use of the surplus water which shall not be needed for the purposes of navigation flowing over the dams now under construction by the United States in the Mississippi River between the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis, Minn.

That such commission shall be composed of one officer of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, one officer of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, both of whom shall be designated by the Secretary of War, and one official of the Treasury Department, who shall be an expert in electrical engineering, who shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That this commission shall examine and report upon the following propositions:

First. Whether there will be any surplus water flowing over said dams not needed for the purposes of navigation which might be available for mechanical or commercial power.

Second. Whether such power, or any part thereof, could be economically utilized for furnishing the light and power now needed or which hereafter may be needed in the buildings and property of the United States at St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Fort Snelling, Minn.; and if so, to what extent, and what proportion or amount of the available power could be so utilized by the United States or disposed of in any manner to the advantage of the United States.

Third. If it shall appear to said commission feasible and economical for the United States to use or dispose of such power or any part thereof, then said commission shall report a plan or plans, with terms and conditions for such use or disposition, and an estimate of the cost thereof to the United States.

SEC. 3. That the said commission shall meet at such time and place as may be directed by the Secretary of War, and shall transmit said report within two years after the passage of this act.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have the first section read again. My attention was distracted by another matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the first section of the bill.

The Secretary read as requested.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the bill raises a very important question. I should suppose that the water power in these rivers would belong to the riparian owners—the owners of the adjacent land.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to explain to the Senator that these are Government dams constructed in the aid of navigation between Minneapolis and St. Paul, near Fort Snelling. The Government acquired the right by condemnation to construct the dams. It is Government property; and the sole object is to ascertain whether any of the surplus water can be used for these other purposes. Fort Snelling is close by, and the object is to supply it with the electric power, and also the United States public buildings in Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Government own the land on both sides of these dams?

Mr. NELSON. It owns it so far as the flowage is concerned.

Mr. ALDRICH. That may raise a very important question of ownership. I assume that the United States does not and will not claim the right to use waters that are navigable for the production of light and power in competition with private individuals.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think there is any conflict. This is simply to provide for an investigation and report on that question. That is all that there is involved in the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not objecting to the bill for the appointment of a commission, but it looks very much as though it is a first step the Government is going to take into the business of competing with private individuals in the manufacture and production of power.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think there is anything of that kind involved in the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Does it not look like every drop of water in the country that can be picked up for any purpose is going to be taken away from transportation in the rivers?

Mr. NELSON. This does not allow the taking of a drop of water needed for navigation.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that it is for the purpose of allowing the Government to use the power from Government dams for the manufacture of light and heating.

Mr. NELSON. Yes. We have a great military post at Fort Snelling, near this dam.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is not for private use?

Mr. NELSON. It is not for private use at all. It is for Government purposes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will ask the Senator if he has looked into the question as to whether the Government of the United States has any control whatever over these waters?

Mr. NELSON. They are Government dams built on a navigable river.

Mr. HOPKINS. That may be, but is there anything in that that would give the Government of the United States the power to divert the water for any purpose?

Mr. NELSON. For public purposes, for Government purposes?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; even for that?

Mr. NELSON. I think so; but——

Mr. HOPKINS. Except for navigation, and even in a limited way for that purpose.

Mr. NELSON. I think so. However, this simply involves a consideration of the question and a report. It does not commit the Government to the plan.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will state to the Senator, if he will permit me, that under the river and harbor act that was passed some years ago a commission was authorized to look into the conditions of the waters of the Great Lakes in conjunction with a commission appointed by Great Britain, and that commission, in my judgment, has made some egregious blunders against the interests of the United States, and especially against the interests of the several States that really own the water. The Government of the United States has no authority in the water. The water belongs to the several States, and they must determine its use, outside of the question of navigation. It seems to me that if the Senator will look into this matter he will find that the Government of the United States has no authority whatever over a proposition of this character.

Mr. NELSON. It may be that an act of the legislature supplemental to this act would be necessary. But the Senator can see that, this being a Government dam, without the consent of the United States, even with that of the State legislature, they could not use the water that was made by the dam. These dams were built for the purposes of navigation between St. Paul and Minneapolis, to make the Mississippi River navigable from St. Paul up to the mills at Minneapolis. If any such question as the Senator suggests might arise in the matter, it is a question the legislature of the State will solve. Certainly, if there is such a question, it will require the consent both of the United States and of the State.

The bill simply proposes to appoint a commission to investigate whether any surplus water can be used above what is needed for navigation, and they are to report to the Secretary of War for transmission to Congress. It does not go beyond that. If this other question arises, then it is a matter that can be settled by the State legislature. There are at present no objections anywhere, either by the people of St. Paul or Minneapolis or any of the riparian owners.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator the only reason why a dam was constructed there at all was that it was in the interest of the commerce of the river itself, in which the several States from the source to the mouth of the river are just as much interested as the people at St. Paul and Minneapolis. They can not use that water for any other purpose. In my judgment, the people down at Cairo, Ill., or at St. Louis, Mo., or down farther, clear to the mouth of the Mississippi River, have just as much right to be consulted on the question as to the diversion of any of the water that goes over the dam there as the people of Minneapolis or St. Paul.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is correct, and this commission is to consider that very question.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the Government of the United States has no authority over that. That must be done through the legislatures of the various States that border the river.

Mr. NELSON. No; the particular question whether any surplus water is needed above the requirements of navigation is a question belonging to the United States Government, not to the States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, under the statement of the Senator from Minnesota I am not going to object to this specific bill, because he says it is not to determine any rights; but I think the bill involves a great question that should be carefully looked into by the Senators from the several States bordering on that great waterway.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I understand the bill it has in view the survey or the investigation by a commission to determine whether any of the water which flows over the dam can be used to run machinery.

Mr. NELSON. To run electrical power in the Government establishments.

Mr. TILLMAN. For the benefit of the Government?

Mr. NELSON. For the benefit of the Government. The Government has a great military post, with which Senators are familiar, at Fort Snelling. There has been a military post there ever since 1820, and it is close by this dam.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely wish to remark that I never saw any water that was in a mill pond (and this is something like a mill pond above a dam, because the water is deepened by the dam) which could be so far diverted but that it would not get back into the stream below, unless it was pumped off somewhere and destroyed. I can not see how in the name of common sense the utilization of this water to run machinery, when the water would go right immediately back to the river, is going to divert any of it from the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is undoubtedly right. The water would go right back into the river immediately, and it would not diminish the flow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask whether the jurisdiction of the United States over this matter is supposed to arise from the fact that it built a dam, or whether on account of the fact that these are navigable waters—that is, whether the United States can take possession of any river which is supposed to be navigable and build dams and erect factories of one kind or another and go into the business of competing with citizens of the United States in various ways?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have seen at Rock Island, in Illinois, a somewhat similar situation. There is at Rock Island one of the largest electric plants in the United States. The electricity is generated by the waters of the Mississippi River, and the Government utilizes that electricity to run machinery in the Rock Island Arsenal.

Mr. NELSON. That is the fact; and this case is precisely analogous to it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought from listening to the reading of the bill that it contemplated other uses.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; simply Government uses, that is all, for the great military post there and for the Government buildings, the public buildings at St. Paul and Minneapolis. It is exactly as the Senator from South Carolina has stated—analogous to the case at Rock Island.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that I was not mistaken about the declared purpose for creating the commission. It is to be appointed to report to Congress concerning the use of certain surplus water without restricting its contemplated use to Government purposes.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will turn to the other page——

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the second inquiry. The first and the main inquiry is as to the use of it. I will not raise the point, but the first section is subject to the construction which I placed upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. It will not divert any water or involve the Government in competing with any industry until Congress ascertains whether there is surplus water.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHATTAHOOCHEE RIVER BRIDGES.

Mr. PILES. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19815) to authorize the Georgia, Florida and Alabama Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Chattahoochee River between Columbus, Ga., and Franklin, Ga., to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PILES. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19816) to authorize the Georgia, Florida and Alabama Railway Company to construct three railroad bridges across the Chattahoochee River, one at or near the city of Eufaula, Ala., and two between said city of Eufaula and the city of Columbus, Ga., to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT RESERVATION IN HILO, HAWAII.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I am directed by the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico to report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 10106) providing for the setting aside for governmental purposes of certain ground in Hilo, Hawaii, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSÉ MARTÍN CALVO.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, to report an original joint resolution, which I send to the desk. As it is very short and it is important that it should be passed at the present time, I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. R. 66) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Mr. José Martín Calvo, of Costa Rica, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to permit Mr. José Martín Calvo, of Costa Rica, to receive instruction at the Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby: And provided further, That in the case of the said José Martín Calvo the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORESTRY LAND GRANT TO WISCONSIN.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill reported this morning from the Committee on Public Lands by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], granting lands to the State of Wisconsin for forestry purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate, subject to objection.

The bill (S. 6462) granting lands to the State of Wisconsin for forestry purposes was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to cause patents to issue to the State of Wisconsin for not more than 20,000 acres of such unappropriated, unoccupied, nonmineral public lands of the United States north of the township line between townships 33 and 34 north, fourth principal meridian, as may be selected by and within said State for forestry purposes. The lands hereby granted, except as herein provided, shall be used as a forest reserve only, and should the State of Wisconsin abandon the use of said lands for such purpose, alienate or attempt to alienate or use the same or any part thereof for purposes other than that for which granted, except upon consent of the Secretary of the Interior, as hereinafter provided, the same shall revert to the United States. If it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary that any tract or tracts of the land hereby granted are better suited for agricultural than for forestry purposes or by reason of their isolation are not available for forest-reserve purposes, he may, by order, consent to the sale of such tract or tracts by the State of Wisconsin, upon condition that the proceeds of such sale shall be used by the said State in the reforestation of the permanent forest reserves established by said State, and that in event the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States the said State will account for all such moneys and will pay over to the United States all sums derived from the sales of these lands and not actually used in reforestation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the bill (S. 4284) granting to the State of Wisconsin the residue of unappropriated and unreserved public lands within said State as an addition to the State forest reserves of said State be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED RULE AS TO CONFERENCE REPORTS.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice, in accordance with the provision of Rule XL, of an amendment intended to be proposed to the rules of the Senate providing for the reception of a point of order against a conference report, and I submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That whenever objection is made that a conference report includes matter beyond the jurisdiction of the conference committee, the point of order shall be determined in the first instance by the Chair, and shall be finally disposed of by the Senate before the conference report itself is considered.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if it be permissible, I should like to have the resolution remain on the table, so that I may call it up within the next day or two. I think it is generally agreed that some rule of the kind provided for in the resolution ought to be adopted, and it possibly could be adopted without any debate or contest. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the resolution lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table, and be printed.

INTRODUCTION OF REINDEER INTO ALASKA.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon "The Introduction of Domestic Reindeer into the District of Alaska" for 1905, together with the maps and illustrations.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. SPOONER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk, in lieu of the messenger authorized by the resolution of January 4, 1906, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,800 per annum until otherwise provided by law.

BYRON K. MAY.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return the bill (S. 1510) entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Byron K. May."

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—SOL MARKEE.

On motion of Mr. CLAPP, it was Ordered, That permission be, and is hereby, granted to withdraw from the Senate files the petition of Sol Markee and others for the draining of Pelican Lake, Minnesota, referred to the Committee on Public Lands January 11, 1906, no adverse report having been made on the matter.

PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] yesterday, which will be read.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] made objection to the form of the resolution that I offered in the Senate yesterday. We have agreed as to the form of it. I have modified the resolution, and I ask for the adoption of the resolution as it has been modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama has modified the resolution presented by him on yesterday, and now asks for its adoption. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That it is referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals to inquire, with all reasonable diligence, and to report by bill or otherwise—

First. Whether it is necessary and is consistent with public policy and proper economy that the business and property of the Panama Railroad should continue to be held or conducted under and in accordance with the charter of the Panama Railroad Company enacted by the legislature of the State of New York and should remain under the legislative or other control of that State, or whether the control of said railroad and of all property held or controlled in its name or in connection with it should be placed under the jurisdiction and control and in the possession of the Isthmian Canal Commission or other lawful authority in the Panama Canal Zone subject to the authority of Congress.

Second. Whether the Government of the United States should assume the outstanding debts and obligations of the Panama Railroad Company, and what provision should be made for their liquidation or payment.

Third. Whether the Government of the United States has any and what right to stock in the New Panama Canal Company that was issued to the Government of Colombia to the amount of 5,000,000 francs, or to any dividends or payments due on such stock from any funds in the treasury of said canal company.

Fourth. Whether the persons claiming to be members of the board of directors of the Panama Railroad Company hold such places as directors by any lawful tenure or authority, and, if they are not so entitled, whether their appointment as such directors should be sanctioned by the approval of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

LOANS BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8973) to amend section 5200, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to national banks.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, on page 1, line 12, after the word "fund," to strike out:

Provided, however, That the total of such liabilities shall in no event exceed 20 per cent of the capital stock of the association.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such associations, actually paid in and unimpaired and one-tenth part of its unimpaired surplus fund. But the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, and the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same shall not be considered as money borrowed."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance. In the absence of objection, it will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I object to that, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the question will be on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I believe that Congress ought to provide by a suitable law for including a reasonable surplus in the 10 per cent which a bank may loan to one of its customers, but I do not believe that the surplus should be without a limitation.

The trouble with this provision, if the committee amendment should be adopted, is that it will encourage banks to transact their business on a surplus rather than on a capital. To illustrate what I mean, if the bank can treat its surplus in every way precisely as it treats its capital and may loan it without any limitation upon its amount, the temptation would be for men who are about to engage in the banking business to have a small capital and a large surplus, because the money, whether surplus or capital, would be available for all the necessities of the bank without distinction; but when you come to look to the security of the depositors and creditors of the bank there is a very important difference. Stockholders are liable to depositors and creditors of a bank according to the capital stock, and not according to the surplus. Therefore, if the surplus be accorded all the privileges of the capital, the inevitable tendency in this country will be to bank upon surplus and not upon capital.

If I and my associates were about to organize a bank with a million dollars of capital and this bill should become a law, we would not organize with a million dollars capital at all, but we would organize with $100,000 capital and $900,000 surplus. The advantage in so organizing would be that in the event of failure the stockholders would be liable to the creditors and depositors to the extent of $100,000, and no more; whereas if they organized with a capital of $1,000,000 and the bank should fail the stockholders would be liable to the depositors and creditors to the extent of $1,000,000. Now, sir, if a bank organized with $100,000 capital and $900,000 surplus should fail for $500,000 above its assets, the stockholders would respond to the extent of $100,000 only and the creditors would lose $400,000. On the other hand, if it organized with $900,000 capital and $100,000 surplus and it should fail for $500,000, the depositors and creditors would not lose one farthing, assuming that the stockholders were solvent, because the liability of the stockholder to the extent of his holding would be sufficient to liquidate the entire debt.

We have what is said to be the safest banking system in the world. I doubt that; but certainly it is the safest banking system that this country has ever known. The only criticism which is now heard against it is that in its practical operation it lacks elasticity, but it must be remembered that its very want of elasticity is one of the things that insures its safety. Either we ought to repeal that part of the law which limits the liability of the stockholder to the capital and include the surplus or else we ought not to encourage the accumulation of a surplus without limit. Not only, Mr. President, is it wrong looking to the creditors of the bank, but it is not altogether safe if you look merely to the stockholders themselves. A bank is organized; a majority control it; and that majority persistently and continually accumulates a surplus instead of dividing the profits of the bank in the shape of dividends. It may happen that the majority are well able to forego their dividends and permit their accumulation as a surplus, but it may also happen that the minority can not pursue that course with the same convenience.

Mr. President, if we adopt this committee amendment we encourage all banks in the accumulation of a surplus as against a capital, and we have taken a long step toward impairing the safety of our present banking system. I repeat what I said in the beginning, that some law of this kind ought to be passed. I am willing to accord this privilege to a surplus equal to the capital stock. The effect of that would be to reduce actually the liability of a stockholder to 50 per cent, whereas the law made it, and the law ought to have made it, equal to 100 per cent; but I am not willing to see a bill pass, and it can not pass except over my protest, that puts a premium upon the accumulation of a surplus, thus relieving stockholders against their personal liability. That personal liability has heretofore been regarded as a very important element in the credit of all banks and in the operation of the national banking system, and it ought not either to be impaired, reduced, or eliminated.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Finance Committee are unanimous in their approval of the provisions of the bill that enlarge the limit of individual loans by national banks from 10 per cent of the capital, as fixed by existing law, to 10 per cent of the capital and surplus. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] believed, and in this differed with the committee, that a further limitation should be placed upon the total amount to be loaned to any one party, and that this amount should not in any case exceed 20 per cent of the capital stock of the bank. He contends that the bill, without this further limitation, reduces the relative liability of the stockholders to creditors.

It is true, as he suggests, that the law as it now stands imposes, in case of failure, a further liability upon stockholders of national banks equal to the amount of capital stock held by them, but I suggest to him that neither the bill nor the amendment proposes to change or reduce that liability.

Mr. BAILEY. I know; but the Senator from Rhode Island agrees that a stockholder is liable to the amount of his stock, and is not liable at all upon the surplus.

Mr. ALDRICH. He is not now, and there is no suggestion to change that liability. The liability remains the same whether the House bill be accepted without amendment or whether the action of the Senate committee in amending it is sustained.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true, Mr. President, but the House bill limiting a loan to 20 per cent of the capital stock where the surplus is sufficient to justify it, still discourages the accumulation of a surplus, because it does not permit the surplus to be used under the same privileges as the capital. So far as the liability is concerned, of course that liability rests upon the capital, and not upon the surplus under the present law, as it will under this. I am not now asking for a change in that respect; I am only insisting that there be a limitation placed in this bill so as not to encourage the accumulation of a surplus as against the investment of capital.

Mr. ALDRICH. The liability of stockholders of the bank to its creditors remains the same in any event; it is also true that the surplus is always available for the creditors of the bank in case of failure. The only question is whether we should put upon loans which may be made by a bank having a large surplus a limit based upon the capital alone and not one based upon both the capital and surplus.

The theory of the bill, as reported by a majority of committee, is that it is perfectly safe banking to loan to any one person found worthy of credit 10 per cent of the capital and accumulated surplus of the bank. The Senator from Texas objects on the ground that some loans might be authorized by banks having a large surplus in excess of 20 per cent of their capital stock. I will say, further, that banks can, under the present law, do the very thing the Senator most strenuously objects to.

Mr. BAILEY. They can not do what I object to now. No bank can now lend over 10 per cent of its capital, without reference to its surplus. It might have a $100,000 capital and $1,000,000 surplus, giving it assets of $1,100,000, but it could make no loan legally or according to the regulations over $10,000 to one customer. If you pass this bill as reported by the committee, it can loan him $110,000. I do not object——

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that it would be unsafe banking?

Mr. BAILEY. I do. If the personal-liability element is valuable, then it is not right to let a bank employ $1,100,000 of assets with a personal liability of only $100,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senator himself does not propose to change that liability, and it will not be changed if this amendment is rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I do not propose to change the liability, because I know I could not do it, but I am protesting against an amendment of the law in this respect when it does not make the stockholders answerable for any part of the surplus. For instance, I illustrate it in this way: Here is a bank in this country with $300,000 capital and $7,000,000 of surplus, all earned in the business, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] says. I commend the thrift that with a small capital earns a large surplus. I think it would have been a little better to have distributed it among the people who own the stock, but that is none of my affair. Probably every stockholder was willing to accumulate it, and so it passes without any just criticism. But that bank, if it should fail to-morrow, would fail for an enormous sum. I know that it is not within the range of probability that it will ever fail, because it is one of the financial institutions in this country, I understand, conservatively managed and marvelously successful. But if it should fail, it would fail for a sum running into the millions, and when the Comptroller of the Currency called on the stockholders to meet its obligation to its creditors, he would get the sum of $300,000, a beggarly sum in comparison with the $7,000,000 surplus and the $300,000 capital upon which the bank had been transacting business.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Texas misunderstood my statement that banks do the thing he objects to under the present law. I referred to his suggestion that under the pending bill as we proposed to amend it a bank could be organized with $100,000 capital and $900,000 surplus, with an extra liability, a double liability, on the part of the stockholders of only $100,000. The same thing could be done with the same limited liability under existing law. The only question at issue is whether we should, as a matter of policy, allow a bank thus organized to loan not more than 10 per cent of its capital and surplus to one party; whether that is good and safe banking. That is the sole question.

Mr. BAILEY. I know, but the Senator from Rhode Island overlooks a point, or else for some reason I am incapable of understanding what I am trying to say. As the law stands to-day, they organize a bank with $1,000,000—$100,000 capital and $900,000 surplus. They could only loan to one person——

Mr. ALDRICH. Ten thousand dollars.

Mr. BAILEY. They could loan $10,000, which would be 10 per cent of its hundred-thousand-dollar capital. But if it is organized under this amendment, then they could loan $100,000 to one customer. In other words, they only loan 10 per cent of the capital and surplus to one man. Thus they could loan to one man the entire personal liability of the stockholders. That is what I object to. I do not care only about them loaning the money so much, but when they loan one man $100,000, if it is lost they exhaust the entire personal liability of all the stockholders. That ought not to be done.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator understands that this liability accrues only in case of insolvency.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Cases have been very rare where that double liability has been enforced.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will go to the records, he will find that while it has not been frequent, it has happened in a number of instances that stockholders have been assessed.

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee differ with the Senator from Texas as to the policy that should be pursued toward the banks in this regard. A large majority of the committee believe that it is desirable from every standpoint to encourage the creation of a surplus on the part of national banks. Of course that surplus in any event is always liable for outstanding debts. We do not believe that the difference in liability is one of practical value—that is, when loans are limited to 10 per cent of the actual capital, the unimpaired capital, and 10 per cent of the unimpaired surplus. I think no harm can come to any creditor of any bank or to any bank through the adoption of the amendment as it was reported by the committee. But I am extremely anxious that this bill should become a law. It ought to pass at this session. There is a general demand for it from the business interests of the whole country, and I am willing to make some concessions that are not approved by my judgment in order to secure this result.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it ought to pass, but I think it ought to pass in the right way.

Mr. ALDRICH. I had some conference with the Senator from Texas yesterday upon this subject, and I am willing that the bill should be modified so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That the total of such liabilities shall in no event exceed 30 per cent of the capital stock of the association.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I merely wanted to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question. I was not aware that the Senator from Texas had the floor.

I hope that the modification suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island will not prevail, and that the amendment as proposed by the committee will stand. I understand that the purpose of the bill, if the Senator from Texas will pardon me for a moment, is to correct to some extent a very bad practice which now prevails among the banks, and that is of disregarding the 10 per cent limitation as provided by law, and I am informed that if this bill becomes a law the Comptroller will see that the banks adhere to the law as this bill provides. It is impossible for the banks of this country as a rule to do business on 10 per cent of the capital.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Comptroller of the Currency intends to adhere to any such determination as that, he will tie up business in almost every section of the country. Take it in my section of the country. During the cotton season it would be absurd to attempt to limit the line of credit to responsible cotton men to 10 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus, because it requires more than that in the daily transactions before he can buy and sell, and the banks really run no risk, because the cotton man has his own deposit there, and every pound of cotton he buys goes to the bank as security.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. The Senator from Texas misunderstood me. I did not mean to say that the Comptroller of the Currency would hold the banks to the 10 per cent rule as it exists to-day. I understand the Comptroller has recommended this change of the law, and he takes the position that if the law is so changed he will require the banks to adhere to it. I think it is a wise provision, and I hope the committee amendment may be allowed to stand as it has come to the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble with that would be that in certain parts of the country, where the banks are not able to go on accumulating from year to year these enormous surpluses, there would be practically little benefit; and if I thought the Comptroller of the Currency intended to enforce that rule, I would feel it my duty to employ every legitimate means to defeat this bill, because in the cotton States of the South few banks have a surplus equal to their capital, and therefore the extension of the privilege of the 10 per cent loan to the surplus would not meet the conditions that exist there.

My own opinion is that this restriction was originally put into the banking law when loans were made largely on personal credit. I do not believe that it would have ever been insisted that when a man offered to the bank securities which could be realized on without any serious delay this restriction should be enforced. I have never myself been a supporter of the national banking system. I have never believed that the banks ought to issue currency. I have always regarded that as a function of the Government. Nor have I ever been able to reconcile myself to the idea of sending out a $3,000 examiner to tell a $20,000 bank president how to run his bank. I have rather inclined to the belief that when a man puts his money in a bank he ought to trust the honesty and integrity of its officers as he must trust the honor and integrity of other men.

But my views never have prevailed on that question, and so I am bound to legislate, so far as I legislate at all, according to the conditions as they are and not according to the conditions I wish existed. Fearing, Mr. President, that I may not be able to secure any limitation at all, and believing that a limitation is very important, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island that we reject the committee's amendment, which removes all limitation as to the surplus, and make it 30 per cent. That gives the bank the right to treat its surplus the same as capital in making loans to the extent of twice its capital. I hold to the personal liability for two reasons. Not only does it help to reimburse the depositors and to pay the creditors when there is a bank failure, but it makes the men who are stockholders and directors in a bank much more careful when they understand that they have a personal liability beyond and in addition to the loss of their stock.

I am disposed to think that it would be an excellent idea to make the directors liable for capital and surplus. Then I would be willing to remove the restriction as is here provided; but apparently that can not be done. Of course they must lose the surplus before there can be any assessment against them, but the trouble is they put in $100,000 and call it "capital," and they put in $900,000 and call it "surplus." When the bank fails, if it does fail, the stockholders are personally liable to the extent of $100,000 and personally exempt to the extent of the other $900,000. If it were reversed, and they should put in $900,000 of capital and $100,000 of surplus and the bank failed, the stockholders would be liable for $900,000 in addition to their stock, and would only be exempt to the extent of $100,000. What I complain of is that a large surplus is a large exemption of personal liability in favor of the stockholders. But I am willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island as the best that can be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the language proposed to be stricken out by striking out "twenty" and inserting "thirty," and to disagree to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not prevail. I am satisfied that the banks of the country, and especially the banks of the South, will be unable to do the business of their sections under a limitation such as is proposed in this modified amendment. As a rule, the banks of the South have organized with small capital. They have relied on building up a surplus, and it is considered good banking that the surplus should be built up as rapidly as possible. Some of these national banks have a capital of $25,000, and others $50,000, and if they are confined by such a provision as this, they will be totally unable to do the business of their section, because the Comptroller has personally notified me that he will require the banks to adhere to this proposed law if it passes the Congress. He is not requiring them as vigorously to adhere to the existing law as might be done, for the reason that it has become the habit with the banks of the country to disregard the 10 per cent limitation to a certain extent, but he says that if this bill passes he will take it as a direction and he will not allow banks to exceed the amount which this proposed act authorizes them to loan.

I hope, therefore, in the interest of banking all over the country, and particularly in the South, that the proviso as modified will be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to know on what sound principle it is proposed to strike out the provision as it came from the House, limiting it to 20 per cent?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I understand that is the House provision, and the amendment comes from the Senate committee.

Mr. PETTUS. The amendment to strike it out comes from the Senate committee.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Yes.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to know on what sound principle it is proposed to strike it out.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It is considered absolutely good banking that a bank of large accumulated earnings in the form of surplus should be allowed to treat the surplus in part as capital in the matter of making loans. I see nothing unsound about that banking principle. I think it is sound; and I think it is one which is essential in doing business in this country, and especially in the section to which the Senator from Texas has referred.

Mr. PETTUS. Suppose they have not any large surplus?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. If they have no surplus they can not loan it.

Mr. PETTUS. They are still authorized to loan to one man double the present amount.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Not at all. If they have no surplus, they will be confined to the present law as to capital, which is one-tenth.

Mr. PETTUS. As I understand this bill, if they have a capital of a hundred thousand dollars only and no surplus, they would still be authorized to loan $20,000 to one man.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I do not understand the bill in that way.

Mr. PETTUS. That is the way it reads.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I understand that a bank without a surplus would be allowed to loan 10 per cent of its capital.

Mr. PETTUS. This does not say a word about having or not having a surplus.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. The banks under this bill would be allowed to treat the surplus as capital, and make a 10 per cent loan on the whole.

Mr. PETTUS. This does not say a word about having a surplus or not having a surplus.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. This is an amendment of existing law.

Mr. PETTUS. The amendment commences with the last word on the first page of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. On that I ask for a division.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks for a division.

Mr. ALDRICH. We may as well have the yeas and nays, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Chair to state the immediate matter to be voted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment proposes to strike out the following:

Provided, however, That the total of such liabilities shall in no event exceed 30 per cent of the capital stock of the association.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Chair to say that the question was on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. The modification was to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty;" and it is proposed to disagree to the amendment to strike out the proviso as modified.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Rhode Island had better explain the amendment. I was going to do so, but I see the Senator from Rhode Island is here.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the question of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I was inquiring as to what is the precise question before the Senate. I knew that the Senator from Florida was opposed to the modification, and that is the matter upon which he desired a division. The question as stated by the Chair treated the modification as one which had been adopted, and therefore the matter before the Senate was not the adoption of the modification, but the amendment as thus amended. I was uncertain whether that particular presentation was correct.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not sure just how the Presiding Officer stated the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Rhode Island moved that the Senate strike out the word "twenty" in the part proposed to be stricken out and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And then to disagree to the Senate amendment to strike out. That is the question.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the amendment substituting "thirty" for "twenty" had been agreed to. I understood the Senator from Florida to be opposing any limitation with respect to the surplus. Now, if I could vote as between twenty and thirty, I should vote for twenty, the House provision; that is, if there is to be a contest. If there is an understanding, of course, I would abide by the understanding. If there is now to be a vote between no limitation as advocated by the Senator from Florida——

Mr. TALIAFERRO. No limitation beyond the 10 per cent.

Mr. BAILEY. What I am trying to do is to prevent the accumulation of a surplus which exempts the stockholders of banks from personal liability. And that is the whole purpose I have. Now, if there is to be no limitation as the Senate committee reported, of course on that I will vote "no," because I am opposed to it. But my understanding is that the question now is upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the first question is to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first question is to perfect the part to be stricken out.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And the next question will be on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out the proviso.

Mr. ALDRICH. The first question will be whether we will insert "thirty" instead of "twenty," and then the question will come on striking out the whole proviso.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Florida would want thirty as against twenty.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I understood the Chair to hold that the amendment as modified by the Senator from Rhode Island had been adopted by the Senate. I asked for a division on the question of the adoption of his modification. That was my purpose.

Mr. BAILEY. That is right.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I hold that the division or the yea-and-nay vote is to determine whether the amendment as modified by the Senator from Rhode Island shall be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. It has not yet been modified.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the question.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. KEAN. Why can we not vote on the committee amendment first?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question again, if desired, upon the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, to strike out in the part proposed to be stricken out the word "twenty" and inserting "thirty."

Mr. TALIAFERRO. The question is whether the Senate will accept the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, to insert "thirty" instead of "twenty," as the House provided. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. KEAN. Why should we not first vote on the amendment reported by the committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks there will be no difficulty if Senators will note carefully the text of the bill, and will also observe the effect of the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, which is to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty" in the part proposed to be stricken out. The Chair will put that question, in order that there may be no misunderstanding.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire, if there is to be a yea-and-nay vote, that some Senator familiar with the measure shall briefly state what the measure is and what the vote is upon. Several Senators have come in since this discussion has been under way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment to strike out the proviso as amended.

Mr. PETTUS. Were not the yeas and nays ordered?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not upon this question, as the Chair understood. The question is on agreeing to the motion to strike out the proviso.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have a division.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the proviso may be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. After the word "fund," in line 12, on page 1——

Mr. PETTUS. Was not a yea-and-nay vote ordered?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A yea-and-nay vote has not been ordered.

The SECRETARY. After the word "fund," in line 12, page 1, it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, however, That the total of such liabilities shall in no event exceed 30 per cent of the capital stock of the association.

Mr. CULLOM. That is it.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senate strikes that out, it will remove every limitation.

Mr. ALDRICH. It will remove them all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair, the "noes" have it.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPOONER. The yeas and nays are demanded on what?

Mr. BLACKBURN. On the motion to strike out the proviso.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To strike out the proviso as amended.

Mr. RAYNER. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask if there is a second.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MILLARD (when Mr. BURKETT'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. BURKETT] is necessarily absent from the city. If he were here, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was resumed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The confusion is so great in the Chamber that no one can hear the responses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll call will be suspended until Senators take their seats. The Chair must request Senators to kindly preserve order.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the trouble about the Senate is that the Senate is in profound ignorance of the question that is now being voted upon, as I am——

Mr. GALLINGER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order. The roll call has begun, and it must proceed.

Mr. PATTERSON. I simply want to ask a parliamentary question, whether or not it will be in order——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No debate is in order.

Mr. PATTERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the roll call proceed.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator can not interrupt the roll call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado is out of order.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I ask the Chair a parliamentary question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has said to the Senator that he is out of order.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then I will take my seat.

The roll call was resumed.

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE].

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MCCREARY] is necessarily absent from the city.

Mr. TILLMAN. My colleague [Mr. LATIMER] is necessarily absent from the Senate, and is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. WARREN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming] is necessarily absent from the city to-day.

Mr. SCOTT. If it were in order, I should like to know what this amendment contemplates. I should like to vote, but I do not know——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is out of order.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 27, as follows:

So the amendment to strike out the proviso was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JARIB L. SANDERSON.

Mr. TELLER. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 6214) for the relief of Jarib L. Sanderson.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Jarib L. Sanderson, of Boulder, Colo., surviving partner of the late firm of Barlow, Sanderson & Co., $7,740, being the amount found by the Secretary of the Interior and the Court of Claims to be the losses sustained by depredations of a band of Cheyenne Indians during hostilities in Kansas and Nebraska in the year 1867, the same to be deducted from annuities now due or hereafter to become due said tribe, this payment being made under treaty stipulations of September 17, 1851.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION.

Mr. NELSON. I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 19432) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Light-House Establishment. The report was made yesterday.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The conference report has been printed in the RECORD, and unless it is desired it will not be read in full. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

NATIONAL CHILD LABOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 6364) to incorporate the National Child Labor Committee.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, in section 2, line 11, page 2, before the word "parental," to strike out the words "public opinion and;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the objects of the said corporation shall be: To promote the welfare of society with respect to the employment of children in gainful occupations; to investigate and report the facts concerning child labor; to raise the standard of parental responsibility with respect to the employment of children; to assist in protecting children, by suitable legislation, against premature or otherwise injurious employment, and thus to aid in securing for them an opportunity for elementary education and physical development sufficient for the demands of citizenship and the requirements of industrial efficiency; to aid in promoting the enforcement of laws relating to child labor; to coordinate, unify, and supplement the work of State or local child-labor committees, and encourage the formation of such committees where they do not exist.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. DRYDEN obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am about to go to a meeting of the conference committee on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which is going to take a great deal of my time for the next few days. I have in my charge a very trifling bill, and yet it is important in some respects to the District. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to yield to me. If it leads to debate I will withdraw it.

Mr. DRYDEN. If it does not lead to debate I will yield.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 118) to amend sections 713 and 714 of "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended by the acts approved January 31 and June 30, 1902, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, on page 2, line 19, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That banking institutions having offices or banking houses in foreign countries as well as in the District of Columbia shall only be required to make and publish the reports provided for in this section semiannually.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have an amendment that I desire to offer to follow the amendment just agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Add after the amendment just agreed to the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the publications authorized or required by said section 5211 of the Revised Statutes, and all other publications authorized or required by existing law to be made in the District of Columbia, shall be printed in two or more daily newspapers of general circulation published in the city of Washington, one of which shall be a morning newspaper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a further amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of section 714a, beginning with line 8, page 3, and including line 18, in the following words:

SEC. 714a. The Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is further authorized to make rules for the regulation of the banking business within the District of Columbia by the banks mentioned in section 713, and to provide for the enforcement of such regulations by the assessment of reasonable fines, which may be collected by suit before the supreme court of the District of Columbia. The expenses of such suit shall be paid from the proceeds of the fines collected, and the balance shall be annually paid to the Treasurer of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DRYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent that the Erie and Ohio Ship Canal bill shall be taken up for consideration this afternoon after the unfinished business shall have been laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that after the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside the Senate proceed with the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DRYDEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1442) to increase the efficiency of the militia and promote rifle practice. It is a bill that comes by unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a short bill, and, I think, will give rise to no discussion.

Mr. DRYDEN. If it will not lead to debate, I will yield to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SHILOH ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DRYDEN. I understand that the Senator from Mississippi has a little bill which he would like to bring up. I yield if it will not lead to debate.

Mr. MONEY. I ask consent now because I leave to-morrow. This is a local measure which has passed the House unanimously and passed the Military Committee of the Senate unanimously, and is approved by the Secretary of War and the Park Commission. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16125) authorizing a license and permit to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to construct a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park, and to operate electric cars thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been read. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAND CANYON FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. DRYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Utah if the bill he wishes to call up will not lead to debate, but I want to say now that I shall have to decline to yield further after the Senator from Utah has presented his measure.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2732) for the protection of wild animals in the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, the Panama Canal problem has reached a stage where a decision should be made to permanently fix the type of the waterway, whether it shall be a sea-level or a lock canal. An immense amount of evidence on the subject has in the past and during recent years been presented to Congress. An overwhelming amount of expert opinion has been collected, and an International Board of Consulting Engineers has made a final report to the President, in which experts of the highest standing divide upon the question. The Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals has likewise divided. It is an issue of transcendent importance, involving the expenditure of an enormous sum of money, and political and commercial consequences of the greatest magnitude, not only to the American people, but to the world at large.

The report of the International Board has been printed and placed before Congress. A critical discussion of the facts and opinions presented by this Board, all more or less of a technical and involved nature, would unduly impose upon the time of the Senate at this late day of the session. In addition, there is the testimony of witnesses called before the Senate committee, which has also been printed in three large volumes, exceeding 3,000 pages of printed matter. To properly separate the evidence for and against one type of canal or the other, to argue upon the facts, which present the greatest conflict of engineering opinion of modern times, would be a mere waste of effort and time, since the evidence and opinions are as far apart and irreconcilable as the final conclusions themselves. It is therefore rather a question which the practical experience and judgment of Members of Congress must decide, and I have entire confidence that the will of the nation, as expressed in its final mandate, will be carried into successful execution, whether that mandate be for a lock canal or sea-level waterway.

The Panama Canal presents at once the most interesting and stupendous project of mankind to overcome by human ingenuity "what Nature herself seems to have attempted, but in vain." From the time when the first Spanish navigators extended their explorations into every bay and inlet of the Central American isthmus, to discover, if possible, a short route to the Indies, or "from Cadiz to Cathay," the human mind has not been willing to rest content and accept as insurmountable the natural obstacles on the Isthmus preventing uninterrupted intercommunication between the Atlantic and the Pacific. Excepting, possibly, Arctic explorations, in all the romantic history of ancient and modern commerce, in all the annals of the early navigators and explorers, there is no chapter that equals in interest the never-ceasing efforts to make the Central American Isthmus a natural highway for the world's commerce—a direct route of trade and transportation from the uttermost East to the uttermost West.

As early as 1536 Charles V ordered an exploration of the Chagres River to learn whether a ship canal could not be substituted for a then already existing wagon road, and Philip II, in 1561, had a similar survey made in Nicaragua for the same purpose. From that day to this the greatest minds in commerce and engineering have given their attention to the problem of an interoceanic waterway, and every conceivable plan has been considered, every possible road has been explored, every mile of land and sea have been gone over to find the best possible and practical solution of the problem.

The history of these early attempts is most interesting, but no longer of practical value or bearing upon present-day problems. Most of the efforts were wasted, much of it was ill advised, but the present can profitably consider the more important lessons of the past. It was written in the book of fate that this enterprise, the most important in the world of commerce and navigation, should be American in its ending as it had been in its practical beginning. From the day when the first train of cars crossed the Isthmus from Panama to Aspinwall to facilitate the transportation of passengers and freight across the narrow belt of land connecting the northern and southern continents, the imperative necessity of a ship canal was made apparent, just as that railway had followed the earlier wagon roads of the Spanish adventurers and their followers.

Natural conditions on the Isthmus materially enhance the physical difficulties to be overcome in canal construction. Even the precise locality or section best adapted to the purpose has for many years been a question of serious doubt. The Isthmus of Tehuantepec, the Nicaraguan route, by utilizing a lake of vast extent, and finally the narrow band of land and mountain chain at Panama, each offer distinct advantages peculiar to themselves, with corresponding disadvantages or local difficulties not met with in the others. Many other projects have been advanced; in all, at least some twenty distinct routes have been laid out by scientific surveys, but the most eminent American engineering talent, considering impartially the natural advantages and local obstacles, each upon their respective merits, finally decided upon the Isthmus, between the Bay of Panama and Limon Bay, in 1849, as the most feasible for the building of the railroad, and some fifty years later for the building of the isthmian canal. Every further study, survey, and inquiry have confirmed the wisdom of the earlier choice, which has been adopted as the best and the permanent plan of the American Government to build a canal at the expense of the nation, but for the ultimate benefit of all mankind.

The Panama Railway marked the beginning of a new era in the history of interoceanic communication. The great practical usefulness of the road soon made the construction of a canal a commercial necessity. The eyes of all the world were upon the Isthmus, but no nation made the subject a matter of more profound study and inquiry than the United States. One surveying party followed another, and every promising project received careful consideration. The conflicting evidence, the great engineering difficulties, the natural obstacles, and, most of all, the civil war delayed active efforts, but public interest continued to view the project with favor and demand an American canal.

During the late seventies a French commission made surveys and investigations on the Isthmus which terminated in the efforts of De Lesseps, who undertook to construct a canal, and, in 1879, called an international scientific congress to consider the project in all its aspects and determine upon a practical solution. The United States was invited to be present by two official delegates, and accordingly President Hayes appointed Admiral Ammen and A. C. Menocal, of the United States Navy, both of whom had been connected with surveys and explorations on the Isthmus. Mr. Menocal presented his plan for a canal by way of Nicaragua, but it was evident that the Wyse project, of a canal by way of the Isthmus of Panama, had the majority in its favor, and the only question to determine was whether the canal to be constructed should be a sea-level or a lock canal. The American delegates were convinced, in the light of their knowledge and experience, that a sea-level canal would be impracticable, if not impossible. In this they were seconded by Sir John Hawkshaw, thoroughly familiar with canal problems, and who exposed the hopelessness of an attempt to make a sea-level ship canal, pointing out that there would be a cataract of the Chagres River at Matachin of 42 feet, which in periods of flood would be 78 feet high, of a body of water that would be 36 feet deep, with a width of 1,500 feet. Opposition to the sea-level project proved to no purpose.

The facts were ignored or treated with indifference by the French, who were determined upon a canal at Panama and at sea level, resting their conclusions upon the success at Suez, with which enterprise, in addition to De Lesseps, many of those present at the congress had been connected. But the problems and conditions to be met on the Isthmus of Panama were decidedly different from those at Suez, and subsequent experience proved the serious error of the sea-level plan as finally adopted. The congress included a large assemblage of nonprofessional men, and of the French engineers present only one or two of whom had ever been on the Isthmus. The final vote was seventy-five in favor of and eight opposed to a sea-level canal. Rear-Admiral Ammen said: "I abstained from voting on the ground that only able engineers can form an opinion after careful study of what is actually possible and what is relatively economical in the construction of a ship canal." Of those in favor of a sea-level canal not one had made a practical and exhaustive study of the facts. The project at this stage was in a state of hopeless confusion. In spite of these obstacles, De Lesseps, with undaunted courage, proceeded to organize a company for the construction of a sea-level canal.

As soon as possible after the adjournment of the Scientific Congress of 1879 the Panama Canal Company was organized, with Ferdinand de Lesseps as president. The company purchased the Wyse concession, and by 1880 sufficient funds had been secured to proceed with the preliminary work. The next two years were used for scientific investigation, surveys, etc., and the actual work commenced in 1883. The plan adopted was for a sea-level canal, having a depth of 29.5 feet and a bottom width of 72 feet. This plan in outline and intent was adhered to practically to the cessation of operations in 1888.

In that year operations came to an end for want of funds. The failure of the company proved disastrous to a very large number of shareholders, mostly French peasants of small means, and for a time the cause of interoceanic communication by way of Panama seemed hopeless. The experience proved the utter impossibility of private enterprise carrying forward a project which had attained a stage where large additional funds were needed to make good enormous losses due to errors in plans, miscarriage of effort, and last, but not least, to fraud on a stupendous scale. With admirable courage, however, the affairs of the old company were reorganized after the appointment of a receiver on February 4, 1889. Proceeding this time with extreme caution, a special scientific commission was appointed to reinvestigate the entire project and report upon the work actually accomplished and its value in future operations.

The commission, made up of eminent engineers, rendered its report on May 5, 1890. The recommendation was for the construction of a canal with locks, the abandonment of the sea-level idea, and a further and more careful reconsideration of the facts on a large scale, upon the ground that the accumulated data were "far from possessing the precision essential to a definite project." This lifted the subject of canal construction out of the domain of preconceived ideas and guesswork into the substantial field of a scientific undertaking for commercial purposes.

The subsequent history of the De Lesseps project and the American effort for a practicable route across the Isthmus are still fresh in our minds and require not to be restated. The Spanish-American war and the voyage of the Oregon by way of Cape Horn more than any other causes combined to direct the attention of the American people to conditions on the Isthmus, and led to the public demand that by one route or another an American waterway should be constructed within a reasonable period of time and at a reasonable cost. It will serve no practical purpose to recite the facts and chain of events which led to the passage of the act of March 3, 1899, which authorized the President to have a full and complete investigation made of the entire subject of isthmian canals.

A million dollars was appropriated for the expenses of the Commission, and in pursuance of the provisions of the act the President appointed a Commission consisting of Rear-Admiral Walker, United States Navy, president, and nine members eminent in their respective professions as experts or engineers. A report was rendered under date of November 30, 1901. In this report the cost of constructing a canal by way of Nicaragua was estimated at $189,864,062, and by way of Panama at $184,233,358, including in the last estimate $40,000,000 for the estimated value of the rights and property of the New Canal Company. The company, however, held its property at a much higher value, or some $109,000,000, which the Commission considered exorbitant, and thus the only alternative was to recommend the construction of a canal by way of the Nicaraguan route. Convinced, however, that the American people were in earnest, the New Panama Company expressed a willingness to reconsider the matter, and finally agreed to the purchase price fixed by the Isthmian Commission.

By the Spooner Act, passed June 28, 1902, Congress authorized the President to purchase the property of the New Panama Canal Company for a price not exceeding $40,000,000, the title to the property having been fully investigated and found valid. The Isthmian Commission, therefore, recommended to Congress the purchase of the property, but the majority of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals disagreed, and it is only to the courage and rare ability of the late Senator Hanna and his associates, as minority members of the committee, that the nation owes it that the Nicaraguan project was abandoned and that the Panama Canal was acquired at a reasonable price and made a national enterprise.

The report of the minority members of the Senate committee was made under date of May 31, 1902. It is, without question, a most able and comprehensive dissertation upon the subject, and forms a most valuable addition to the truly immense literature of isthmian canal construction. The report was signed by Senators Hanna, Pritchard, MILLARD, and KITTREDGE. "We consider," said the committee, "that the Panama route is the best route for an isthmian canal to be owned, constructed, controlled, and protected by the United States." It was a bold challenge of the conclusions of the majority members of the committee, but in entire harmony with, and in strict conformity to, the views and final conclusions of the Isthmian Commission. The minority report was accepted by the Congress and a canal at Panama became an American enterprise for the benefit of the American people and the world at large.

Such, in broad outline, is the present status of the Panama Canal. A grave question presents itself at this time, which demands to be disposed of by Congress, and to which all others are subservient. Shall the waterway be a sea-level or a lock canal? It is a question of tremendous importance—a question of choice equally as important as the one of the route itself. A choice must be made, and it must be made soon. All the subsidiary work, all the related enterprises, depend upon the fundamental difference in type. Opinions differ as widely today as they did at the time when the project was first considered by the international committee in 1879. Engineers of the highest standing at home and abroad have expressed themselves for or against one type or the other, but it is a question upon which no complete agreement is possible. In theory a sea-level canal has unquestionable advantages, but practically the elements of cost and time necessary for the construction preclude to-day, as they did in 1894, when the new canal company recommenced active operations, the building of a sea-level canal. It is not a question of the ideally most desirable, but of the practically most expedient, that confronts the American people and demands solution.

The New Panama Canal Company had approved the lock plan, which placed the minimum elevation of the summit level at 97.5 feet above the sea and a maximum level at 102.5 feet above the same datum. In the words of Prof. William H. Burr:

> It provided for a depth of 29.5 feet of water and a bottom width of canal prism of about 98 feet, except at special places where this width was increased. A dam was to be built near Bohio, which would thus form an artificial lake, with its surface varying from 52.5 to 65.6 feet above the sea. The location of this line was practically the same as that of the old company. The available length of each lock chamber was 738 feet, while the available width was 82 feet, the depth in the clear being 32 feet 10 inches. The lifts were to vary from 26 to 33 feet. It was estimated that the cost of finishing the canal on this plan would be $101,850,000, exclusive of administration and financing.

The Isthmian Commission of 1899–1901 considered the project, reexamined into the facts, and, as stated by Professor Burr—

> The feasibility of a sea-level canal, but with a tidal lock at the Panama end, was carefully considered by the Commission, and an approximate estimate of the cost of completing the work on that plan was made. In round numbers this estimated cost was about $250,000,000, and the time required to complete the work would probably be nearly or quite twice that needed for the construction of a canal with locks. The Commission therefore adopted a project for the canal with locks. Both plans and estimates were carefully developed in accordance therewith.

Professor Burr, now in favor of a sea-level canal, then concurred in the report in favor of a lock canal.

Since the Panama Canal became the property of the nation a vast amount of necessary and preliminary work has been done preparatory to the actual construction of the canal. A complete civil government of the Canal Zone has been established, an army of experts and engineers has been organized, the work of sanitation and police control is in excellent hands, and the Isthmus, or, more properly speaking, the Canal Zone, is to-day in a better, cleaner, and healthier condition than at any time in its history. A considerable amount of excavation and necessary improvements in transportation facilities has been carried to a point where further work must stop until the Isthmian Commission knows the final plan or type of the canal. The reports which have been made of the work of the Commission during its two years of actual control are a complete and affirmative answer to the question whether what has been done so far has been done well and wisely, and the facts and evidence prove that the present state of affairs on the Isthmus are in all respects to the credit of the nation.

Now, it is evident that the question of plan or type of canal is largely one for engineers to determine, but even a layman can form an intelligent opinion, without entering into all the details of so complex a problem as the relative advantage or disadvantage of a sea-level versus a lock canal. This much, however, is readily apparent, that a sea-level canal will cost a vast amount more money and may take twice the time to build, while it will not accommodate a larger traffic or ships of a larger size. A lock canal can be built which will meet all requirements; it can be built deep enough and wide enough to accommodate the largest vessels afloat; it can be so built that transit across the Isthmus can be effected in a reasonably short period of time—in a word, it is a practical project, which will solve every pending question involved in the construction of a transisthmian canal in a practical way, at a reasonable cost, and within a reasonable period of time.

To determine the question the President appointed an international Board of Consulting Engineers. The Board was constituted of the world's foremost men in engineering science, and the report is without question a most valuable document. The President, in his address to the members of the Board on September 11, 1905, outlined his views with regard to the desirability of a sea-level canal, if such a one could be constructed at a reasonable cost and within a reasonable time.

If to build a sea-level canal—> will but slightly increase the risk and will take but little longer than a multilock high-level canal, this, of course, is preferable. But if to adopt the plan of a sea-level canal means to incur great hazard and to incur indefinite delay, then it is not preferable.

He said—

The problem as viewed by the American people could not be more concisely stated. Other things equal, a sea-level canal, no doubt, would be preferable; but it remains to be shown that such a canal would in all essentials provide safe, cheap, and earlier navigation across the Isthmus than a lock canal.

For, as the President further said on the same occasion, there are two prime considerations: First, the utmost practical speed of construction; second, the practical certainty that the proposed plan will be feasible; that it can be carried out with the minimum risk; and in conclusion that—

There may be good reason why the delay incident to the adoption of a plan for an ideal canal should be incurred; but if there is not, then I hope to see the canal constructed on a system which will bring to the nearest possible date in the future the time when it is practicable to take the first ship across the Isthmus—that is, which will in the shortest time possible secure a Panama waterway between the oceans of such a character as to guarantee permanent and ample communication for the greatest ships of our Navy and for the largest steamers on either the Atlantic or the Pacific. The delay in transit of the vessels owing to additional locks would be of small consequence when compared with shortening the time for the construction of the canal or diminishing the risks in the construction. In short, I desire your best judgment on all the various questions to be considered in choosing among the various plans for a comparatively high-level multilock canal, for a lower-level canal with fewer locks, and for a sea-level canal. Finally, I urge upon you the necessity of as great expedition in coming to a decision as is compatible with thoroughness in considering the conditions.

The Board organized and met in the city of Washington on September 1, 1905, and on the 10th of January, 1906, or about four months later, made its final report to the President through the Secretary of War. The Board divided upon the question of type for the proposed canal, a majority of eight—five foreign engineers and three American engineers—being in favor of a canal at sea level, while a minority of five—all American engineers—favored a lock canal at a summit level of 85 feet. The two propositions require separate consideration, each upon its own merits, before a final opinion can be arrived at as to the best type of a waterway adapted to our needs and requirements under existing conditions.

Upon a question so involved and complex, where the most eminent engineers divide and disagree, a layman can not be expected to view the problem otherwise than as a business proposition which, demanding solution, must be disposed of by a strictly impartial examination of the facts. Weighed and tested by practical experience in other fields of commercial enterprise, it is probably not going too far to say, as in fact it has been said, that there is entirely too much mere engineering opinion upon this subject and not a well-defined concentrated mass of data and solid convictions. It is equally true, and should be kept in mind, that the time given by the Board to the consideration of the subject in all its practical bearings, including an examination of actual conditions on the Isthmus, was limited to so short a period that it would be contrary to all human experience that this report should represent an infallible or final verdict for or against either of the two propositions.

It is necessary to keep in mind certain facts which may be concisely stated, and which I do not think have been previously brought to the attention of Congress. While the Board had been appointed by the President on June 24, 1905, the first business meeting did not take place until September 1, and the final meeting of the full Board occurred on November 24 of the same year. This was the twenty-seventh meeting during a period of eighty-five days, after which there were three more meetings of the American members, the last having been held on January 31, 1906. Thus the actual proceedings of the full Board were condensed into twenty-seven meetings during less than three months, a part of which time—or, to be specific, six days—was spent on the Isthmus.

The minutes of the proceedings have been printed and form a part of the final report made to the President under date of January 10, 1906. They do not afford as complete an insight into the business transactions of the Board as would be desirable, and the evidence is wanting that the subject was as thoroughly discussed in all its details, with particular reference to the two propositions of a sea-level or a lock canal, as would seem necessary. Very important features necessary to the sea-level plan were treated in the most superficial way, guessed at, or wholly ignored. I do not hesitate to say that no banking house in the world called upon to provide the funds necessary for an enterprise of this magnitude as a private undertaking would advance a single dollar upon a project as it is here presented by the majority of the Board to the American Congress as the final conclusion of engineers of the highest standing. The Board, as I have said, divided upon the question and by a majority of eight pronounced in favor of a sea-level against a minority of five in favor of a lock canal. Let us inquire how this conclusion, of momentous importance to the nation, was arrived at and whether the minutes of the Board furnish a conclusive answer.

As early as the sixth meeting, or on September 16—that is, after the Board had been only fifteen days in existence—a resolution was introduced by Mr. Hunter, chief engineer of the Manchester Ship Canal, requesting that a special committee be appointed to prepare at once a project for a sea-level canal.

Mr. SPOONER. What was the date of the resolution with respect to the lock canal?

Mr. DRYDEN. October 3, seventeen days afterwards.

In marked contrast, it was not until after the Board had visited the Isthmus and while the members were on their way home—that is, at sea—on October 3, that, on motion of Mr. Stearns, a corresponding committee was appointed to prepare plans for a lock canal. This recital of dates is of very considerable importance, for it is evident that there was a decided and early preference on the part of certain members of the Board for a sea-level canal, and that to this particular project more attention was given and a more determined attempt was made to secure data in its defense than to the corresponding project for a lock canal.

That is to say, while the special committee for the consideration of a sea-level canal had been appointed on September 16, the corresponding committee to consider the lock project was not appointed until October 3, or seventeen days later, with the additional disadvantage of the Board being on the ocean, with no opportunity to send for persons and papers during the short period of time remaining to take into due consideration all the facts pertaining to a lock canal, for, as I have said before, the last business meeting was held on November 24.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DRYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I would ask the Senator whether on the 16th of September, when this motion was made by Mr. Hunter, if I remember correctly, the Board of Engineers had completed their investigations and explorations on the Isthmus? I did not observe.

Mr. DRYDEN. No.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. DRYDEN. I yield.

Mr. KITTREDGE. If the Senator from New Jersey will permit me, I will be glad to answer the question of the Senator from Ohio. The Board of Consulting Engineers sailed from New York on the 28th of September for the Isthmus and returned about the middle or 20th of October.

Mr. FORAKER. Sailed from the Isthmus?

Mr. KITTREDGE. Sailed from New York for the Isthmus.

Mr. FORAKER. Then the motion was made by Mr. Hunter before the Board of Engineers left the United States.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Certainly; to appoint a committee of investigation.

Mr. DRYDEN. I should like to say at this point that while I have gladly yielded to Senators, I think it is quite probable that before I get through I shall cover any questions that may be asked. I would prefer to complete my remarks, and then I shall be very glad to answer any questions that Senators may choose to ask.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg pardon.

Mr. DRYDEN. I was glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. The speech is a very interesting one.

Mr. DRYDEN. There is nothing in the minutes of the Board which discloses that either proposition received the necessary deliberate consideration of the extremely complex and important details entering into the two respective projects, but it is evident that regarding the sea-level proposition at least, there was a decided bias practically from the outset which matured in the majority report favoring that proposition. What was in the minds of the members, what was done outside of the Board meetings, by what means or methods conclusions were reached, has not been made a matter of record, and is not therefore, within the knowledge of Congress.

It is true that the respective reports of the two committees were brought before the Board as a whole on November 14 and that the subject was discussed at some length on November 18, at which each member of the Board expressed his views for or against either of the two projects. But there remained but ten days before the last business meeting of the Board was held, when the foreign members sailed for home. The final reports, as they are now before Congress, apparently never received the proper and extended consideration of the Board as a whole, and the minority report favoring a lock canal seems never to have been discussed upon its merits at all. When I recall the very different procedure of the technical commission appointed by the New Panama Canal Company, which extended its consideration of the subject from February 3, 1896, to September 8, 1898, during which time ninety-seven stated meetings and a large number of informal meetings were held, I say I can but think that from a practical business point of view, casting no reflection upon either the ability or the fairness of judgment of the members of the International Board, the mere element of time should weigh decidedly in favor of the verdict of the technical commission of 1898, which was unanimous for a lock canal.

Of the technical commission of 1896–1898, Mr. Hunter, chief engineer of the Manchester Ship Canal, was a member, and he, at that time and without a word of dissent, joined the other members in giving the unanimous and emphatic expression of the committee in favor of a lock canal.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DRYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator kindly repeat the date of that?

Mr. DRYDEN. Of the technical commission of 1896–1898. Mr. Hunter, the chief engineer of the Manchester Canal, was a member. The technical commission was of the new French company.

Mr. TELLER. You refer to the commission of the new French company?

Mr. DRYDEN. Yes, sir; the commission of the new French company.

Why he should now change his views and convictions and why he should now be so emphatic and pronounced in favor of a sea-level project is not set forth in anything that has been printed or been communicated to the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals. This hurried action, this scanty consideration, as I have stated, is the foundation upon which the advocates of the sea-level plan rest their appeal for support. This is the report and the evidence upon which Congress is requested to pronounce in favor of a sea-level project and give its indorsement to a plan which will involve the country in at least of $100,000,000 of additional expenditure and which will delay the opening of the canal for practical purposes of navigation possibly for ten years or more after the lock canal can be finished and opened for use.

The Isthmian Commission restates certain points in a clear and precise way, which leaves no escape from the conclusion that both as to time and cost the majority members of the Board materially underestimated important factors, and that they have every reason to believe that the total estimate of cost of a sea-level canal should be raised to $272,000,000, and that the estimate of time for construction should be increased to at least fifteen and a half years. But under certain readily conceivable conditions it is practically certain that the construction of a sea-level canal will consume not less than twenty years.

The Isthmian Commission reexamined carefully the question of relative efficiency of the proposed sea-level canal compared with a lock canal, and they pronounce emphatically and unequivocally in favor of the lock project. They consider that the assumed danger from accidents to locks by passing vessels or otherwise, as greatly exaggerated, and hold that while no doubt accidents may occur, and possibly will occur, such dangers can and will be sufficiently guarded against by an effective method of supervision and control. They hold that a lock canal properly constructed and managed is in no sense a menace to the safety of vessels, and that such practical experience, and particularly the half century of successful operation of the Soo Canal, has demonstrated the contrary beyond dispute. They point out that the canal with locks at a level of 85 feet will be a waterway three times the size, in navigable area, of the projected sea-level canal, and that omitting the locks from consideration will therefore afford three times the shipping facilities.

They show that in the sea-level canal there will be many and serious curves, while in the lock canal the courses are straight and changes of direction will be made at intersecting tangents, the same as in our river navigation, in which serious accidents are practically unknown. They show that the courses in a lock canal can be marked with ranges which will greatly facilitate navigation, particularly at night. The Commission points out that the argument of the majority of the Board, that locks will limit the traffic capacity of the canal, carries very little, if any, weight, and they refer to the experience of the Soo Canal, through which there passes annually a larger traffic than through all the other ship canals of the world combined.

Finally, the Isthmian Commission discusses the cost of operation and maintenance. The majority of the Board submit no details upon this most important item in canal construction and subsequent operation. What banking house in the world would advance a single dollar upon a canal or railway project upon a mere statement of the probable ultimate cost, but with no corresponding information as to cost of maintenance and operation? Having been appointed to reexamine into all the facts, and, so to speak, reconsider the entire project, the majority seriously erred in omitting from their report the necessary data and calculations for an accurate and trustworthy estimate of the cost of operation and maintenance of a sea-level canal.

From this point of view and in the light of the facts as presented by the Board for or against either project, the Isthmian Commission could not consistently act otherwise than give their final approval to the more specific and practical recommendations of the minority members of the Board, and they properly say that "it appears that the canal proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers can be built in half the time and for a little more than half of the cost of the canal proposed by the majority of the Board." They advance a number of specific reasons why a lock canal when completed will for all practical purposes—commercial, military, and naval—be a better canal than a sea-level waterway with a tidal lock, as proposed by the majority members of the Board.

The report of the Board was carefully and critically examined by Chief Engineer Stevens, of the Isthmian Commission and in actual charge of engineering matters on the Isthmus. Mr. Stevens is a man of very large practical American engineering experience, and he adds to the findings of the Commission the weight of his authority, decidedly and unequivocally in favor of a lock canal. He states as the sum of his conclusions that, all things considered, the lock or high-level canal is preferable to the sea-level type, so called, for the reason that it will provide a safer and quicker passage for ships; that it will provide beyond question the best solution of the vital problem of how safely to care for the flood waters of the Chagres and other streams; that provision is offered in the lock project for enlarging its capacity to almost any extent at very much less expense of time and money than can be provided for by any sea-level plan; that its cost of operation, maintenance, and fixed charges, including interest, will be very much less than any sea-level canal, and that the time and cost of its construction will not be more than one-half that of a canal of the sea-level type; that the lock project will permit of navigation by night, and that finally, even at the same cost in time and money, Mr. Stevens would favor the adoption of the high-level lock canal plan in preference to that of the proposed sea-level canal.

To these observations and comments the Secretary of War, under whose supervision this great work is going on, adds his opinion decidedly and unequivocally in favor of a lock canal. In his letter to the President Mr. Taft goes into all the important details of the subject and reveals a masterly grasp of the situation as it confronts the American people at the present time. He calls attention to the fact that lock navigation is not an experiment; that all the locks in the proposed canal are duplicated, thereby minimizing such dangers as are inherent in any canal project, and he adds that experience shows that with proper plans and regulations the dangers are much more imaginary than real. He goes into the facts of the proposed great dam to be constructed at Gatun and points out that such construction is not experimental, but sustained by large American experience, which is larger, perhaps, than that of any other country in the world. He gives his indorsement to the views of the Isthmian Commission and its chief engineer that the estimated cost of time and money for completing a sea-level canal is not correctly stated by the majority members of the Board, and that the cost, in all probability, will be at least $25,000,000 more, while, in his opinion, eighteen to twenty years will be necessary to complete the sea-level project. He also holds that the military advantages will be decidedly in favor of a lock canal.

This is practically the present status of facts and opinions regarding the canal problem as it is now before Congress, except that since January the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals has collected a large mass of additional and valuable testimony. Restating the facts in a somewhat different way, Congress is asked to give its final approval to the sea-level proposition, chiefly favored by foreign engineers, and to give its disapproval to the project of a lock canal, favored by American engineers. Congress is asked to rely in the main upon the experience gained in the management of the Suez Canal, where the conditions are essentially and fundamentally different from what they are or ever will be on the Isthmus of Panama, and to disregard the more than fifty years' experience in the successful management of the lock canals connecting the Great Lakes. Congress is asked to pronounce against the lock canal because in the management of the ship canal at Manchester several accidents have occurred, due to carelessness or ignorance in navigation, and we are asked to disregard the successful record of the Soo Canal, in the management of which only three accidents, of no very serious importance, have occurred during more than fifty years.

In no other country in the world has there been more experience with lock canals than in this. For nearly a hundred years the Erie Canal has been one of our most successful of inland waterways, connecting the ocean with the Great Lakes. The Erie Canal is 387 miles in length, has 72 locks, and is now being enlarged to accommodate barges of a thousand tons, at a cost of $101,000,000. We have the Ohio Canal, with 150 locks; the Miami and Erie Canal, with 93 locks; the Pennsylvania Canal, with 71 locks; the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, with 73 locks; and numerous other inland waterways of lesser importance. It is a question of degree and not of kind, for the problem is the same in all essentials and confronts Congress as much in the proposed deep waterway connecting tidewater with the Great Lakes, in which locks are proposed with a lift of 40 feet, or more, or very considerably in excess of the proposed lift of the locks on the isthmian canal.

The proposed ship canal from Lake Erie to the Ohio River provides for 34 locks. The suggested canal from Lake Michigan to the Illinois and Mississippi rivers provides for 37 locks, and, finally, the projected ship canal from the St. Lawrence River to Lake Huron contemplates 22 locks. So that lock canals of exceptional magnitude are not only in existence, but new canals of this type are contemplated in the United States and Canada.

In other words, Congress is asked to regard with preference the judgment and opinions of foreign engineers and to disregard the judgment and opinions of American engineers. We are seriously asked to completely disregard American opinion, as voiced by the Isthmian Commission, responsible for the enterprise as a whole; as voiced by the Secretary of War, responsible for the time being for the proper execution of the work; as voiced by Chief Engineer Stevens, who stands foremost among Americans in his profession, and as finally voiced by all the engineers now on the Isthmus who have a practical knowledge of the actual conditions, and who are as thoroughly familiar as any class of men with the problems which confront us and with the conditions which will have to be met. I for one, leaving for the present out of consideration details which are subject to modification and change, believe that it will be a fatal error for the nation to commit itself to the practically hopeless and visionary sea-level project and to delay for many years the opening of this much needed waterway connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific. I for one am opposed to a waste of untold millions and to additional burdens of needless taxation, while the project of a lock canal offers every practical advantage, offers a canal within a reasonable period of time and at a reasonable cost, offers a waterway of enormous advantage to American shipping, of the greatest possible value to the nation in the event of war and the opportunity for the American people to carry into execution at the earliest possible moment what has been called the "dream of navigators," and which has thus far defied the engineering skill of European nations.

But in addition to the evidence presented for or against a sea-level or lock canal project by the two conflicting reports of the Board of Consulting Engineers, there is now available a very considerable mass of testimony of American engineers who were called as witnesses before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals. The testimony has been printed as a separate document and makes a volume of nearly a thousand pages. Much of this evidence is conflicting, much of it is mere engineering opinion, much of it comes perilously near to being engineering guesswork, but a large part of it is of practical value and may safely be relied upon to guide the Congress in an effort to arrive at a final and correct conclusion respecting the type of canal best adapted to our needs and requirements.

A critical examination and review of this testimony, as presented to the Senate committee from day to day for nearly five months, including the testimony of administrative officers and others, relating to Panama Canal affairs generally, is not practicable at this late stage of the session. Among others, the committee examined Mr. John F. Stevens, chief engineer, upon all the essential points in controversy and regarding which, in the light of additional experience and a very considerable amount of new and more exact information, Mr. Stevens reaffirms his convictions in the practicability and superior advantages of a lock canal.

In opposition to the views and conclusions of Mr. Stevens, Prof. William H. Burr pronounced himself emphatically in favor of the sea-level project. As a member of the former Isthmian Commission, reporting upon the type of canal, Mr. Burr had signed the report in favor of the lock project, but as a member of the Board of Consulting Engineers he had sided with the majority favoring the sea-level canal. Thus engineering opinion is as apt as any other human opinion to undergo a change, and the convictions of one year in favor of a proposition may change into opposite convictions, favoring an opposite proposition only a few years later. Mr. William Barclay Parsons, also a member of the Board of Consulting Engineers, who had signed the report in favor of the sea-level project, gave further evidence before the committee, restating his views and convictions in favor of the sea-level type. Mr. William Noble, an engineer of large experience, for some years in charge of the Soo Canal and who, as a member of the Board of Consulting Engineers, had signed the report in favor of a lock project, restates his views and convictions in favor of the lock-level project. Mr. Noble had also been a member of the Isthmian Commission of 1902, reporting at that time in favor of a lock canal.

Mr. Frederick P. Stearns, the foremost American authority on earth-dam construction, gave evidence regarding the safety of the proposed dams at Gatun and other points. His views and conclusions are based upon large practical experience and a profound theoretical knowledge of the subject. Mr. Stearns had also been a member of the Consulting Board of Engineers and as such had signed the report of the minority in favor of the lock project. He reaffirmed his views favoring a lock canal with a dam at Gatun. Mr. John F. Wallace, former chief engineer, gave testimony in favor of the sea-level type and strongly opposed the lock project. Col. Oswald H. Ernst, United States Army, than whom probably few are more thoroughly familiar with conditions on the Isthmus and the entire project of canal construction, declared himself to be strongly in favor of the lock-canal project.

Gen. Peter C. Hains, United States Army, equally well qualified to express an opinion on the subject in all its important points, pronounced himself strongly and unequivocally in favor of a lock canal.

Gen. Henry L. Abbot, United States Army, one of the highest authorities on river hydraulics, thoroughly familiar with Mississippi River flood problems, a former member of the International Technical Commission, of the New Panama Canal Company, and for a time its consulting engineer, a member of different isthmian commissions, and also a member of the consulting board, reemphasized his conviction, sustained by much valuable evidence, in favor of the lock canal project. General Abbot, as a member of the consulting board, had signed the report of the minority in favor of a lock canal. Gen. George W. Davis, United States Army, for a time the governor of the Canal Zone and president of the International Board of Consulting Engineers, restated his views and conviction as opposed to the lock canal type and in favor of the sea-level project. The last witness, Mr. B. M. Harrod, an engineer of large experience, for many years connected with levee construction and river flood problems of the Mississippi River, submitted a statement in which he restated his views in favor of a lock canal.

So that, summing up the evidence of twelve engineers examined before the committee (including Mr. Lindon W. Bates), there were eight American engineers strongly and unequivocally in favor of a lock canal, while four expressed their views to the contrary. Subjecting the mass of testimony to a critical examination, I can not draw any other conclusion or arrive at any other conviction than that the lock project, in the light of the facts and large experience, has decidedly the advantage over the sea-level proposition. And this view is strengthened by the fact that the opinion of the engineers most competent to judge—that is, men like Mr. Noble, who has thoroughly studied lock canal construction, management, and navigation, who as a member of the United States Deep Waterway Commission reexamined probably as thoroughly as any living authority into the entire subject of the mechanics and practice of lock canals, is emphatically opposed to the sea-level proposition.

When we find that a man like Mr. Stearns, of national and international reputation as a waterworks engineer, and who for many years has been in charge of the extensive construction work of the Massachusetts Metropolitan water and sewerage board, and who probably has as large a practical and theoretical knowledge of earth-dam construction as any living authority, declares himself to be strongly in favor of the lock project and believes in the entire safety of the dams required in connection therewith, I hold that such a judgment may be relied upon and that it should govern in national affairs as it would govern in private affairs if the canal construction were a business enterprise and involved the risk of private capital. When we find a man like Mr. Harrod, who for many years has been in charge of levee construction in Louisiana, thoroughly familiar with the theory and practice of river and flood control, express himself in favor of the lock project and in opposition to the sea-level canal, I hold that we may with entire confidence accept his judgment as a governing principle in arriving at a final decision respecting the type of the canal to be finally fixed by the Congress.

And going back to the minority report of the Board of Consulting Engineers, there we find that Mr. Joseph Ripley, the general superintendent at present in charge of the Soo Canal, and Mr. Isham Randolph, chief engineer of the sanitary district of Chicago, and thoroughly familiar ith canal construction and management, both American engineers of much experience and high standing, pronounce themselves in favor of a lock canal. When confronted by these facts, it matters little to me if all the foreign engineers, of whatever standing or reputation, favor the sea-level type. I for one would rely upon American engineers, American conviction, and American experience, and accept the lock-canal proposition.

In this matter, as in all other practical problems, we may safely take the business point of view and calculate without bias or prejudice the respective advantages and disadvantages, and the more thorough the method of reasoning and logic applied to the canal problem, the more emphatic and incontrovertible the conclusion that the Congress should decide in favor of a plan which will give us a navigable waterway across the Isthmus within a measurable distance of time and with a reasonable expenditure of money, as opposed to a visionary theory of an ideal canal which may ultimately be constructed, possibly for the exclusive benefit of future generations, but at an enormous waste of money, time, and opportunity. I do not think we want to repeat at this late stage of the canal problem the fatal error of De Lesseps, who, when he had the opportunity in 1879 to make a choice of a practical waterway, was influenced by his great success at Suez, and upon the most fragmentary evidence, and in the absence of definite knowledge of actual conditions, decided beforehand in favor of a sea-level canal. It was largely his bias and prejudice which proved fatal to the enterprise and to himself.

I may recall that the so-called "international congress of 1879" was a mere subterfuge; that the opinions of eminent engineers, including all the Americans, were opposed to a sea-level project and in favor of a lock canal, but De Lesseps had made his plans, he had arrived at his decision, and in his own words, at a meeting of the American Society of Civil Engineers, held in January, 1880, said "I would have put my hat on and walked out if any other plan than a sea-level canal project had been adopted."

The situation to-day is very similar to the critical state of the canal question in 1902. What was then a question of choice of route is to-day a question of choice of plan.

What was then a geographical conflict is to-day a conflict of engineering opinions. It has been made clear by the reference to the report of the Board of Consulting Engineers and the testimony of the engineers before the Senate committee that the opinion of eminent experts is so widely at variance that there is little, if any, hope of an ultimate reconciliation. It is a choice of one plan or another—of a sea-level or a lock canal. In respect to either plan a mass of testimony and data exists, which has been brought forward to sustain one view or another. In respect to either plan there are advantages and disadvantages. The majority of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals have reported favorably a bill providing for the construction of a canal at sea level. From this majority opinion the minority of the committee emphatically and unequivocally dissent, and in their report express themselves in favor of the lock canal.

The minority report calls attention to the changed conditions and requirements which now demand a canal of much larger dimensions than originally proposed. Even as late as 1901 the depth of the canal prism was only to be 35 feet, against 40 to 45 feet in the project of only five years later. The bottom width has been increased from 150 to 200 feet and over. The length of the locks, in the lock project, has been changed from 740 to 900 feet, and the width from 84 to 90 feet. These facts must be kept in mind, for they bear upon the questions of time and cost, and a sea-level or lock canal, as proposed to-day, is in all respects a very much larger affair, demanding very superior facilities for traffic, to any previous canal project ever suggested or proposed. This change in plans was made necessary by the Spooner Act, which provides for a canal of such dimensions that the largest ship now building, or likely to be built within a reasonable period of time, can be accommodated.

Now, the estimated saving in money alone by adopting the lock plan—that is, on the original investment, to say nothing of accumulating interest charges—would be at least $100,000,000. Granting all that is said in favor of a sea-level canal, it is not apparent by any evidence produced that such a canal would prove a material advantage over a lock canal. All its assumed advantages are entirely offset by the vastly greater cost and longer period of time necessary for construction, and I am confident that they would not be considered for a moment if the canal were built as a commercial enterprise. I do not think that they should hold good where the canal is the work of the nation, because a vast sum of money, useful and necessary for other purposes, will be eventually sunk if the sea-level project is adopted, and entirely upon the theory that if certain conditions should arise that then it would be better to have a sea-level than a lock canal. We have never before proceeded in national undertakings upon such an assumption; we have never before, as far as I know, deliberately disregarded every principle of economy in money and time; we have never before in national projects attempted to conform to ideal conceptions, but we have always adhered to practical, hard, common-sense notions of what is best under the circumstances.

The majority of the committee attacks the proposition that the proposed lock canal shall have "locks with dimensions far exceeding any that have ever been made." If this principle were adopted in every other line of human effort all advancement would come to an end—even the canal enterprise itself—for, as it stands to-day, it far exceeds in magnitude any corresponding effort ever made by this or any other nation. They say that the proposed flight of three locks at Gatun would be objectionable and unsafe, but we have the evidence of American engineers of the highest standing, whose reputations are at stake, who are absolutly confident that these locks can be constructed and operated with entire safety. The committee say that "the entry through and exit from these contiguous locks is attended with very great danger to the lock gates and to the ships as well;" but if mere inherent danger of possible accidents were an objection there would be no great steamships, no great battle ships, no great bridges and tunnels, no great undertakings of any kind.
